for Calumniators,' in which the characters were drawn from living models and he himself appeared as Fitzmorice. His 'Memoirs of the latter Years of Fox' appeared in 1811, attained a third edition within the year, and disappointed readers without distinction of party. The 'Quarterly Review' thought him unjust to Fox, and held that he had misrepresented the relations between him and Sheridan (vi. 541); while James Sharp published 'Remarks in defence of Pitt against the loose and undigested calumny of an unknown adventurer.' Landon wrote 'Observations,' of which a few copies got into circulation (FORSMAN, Life of Landon, p. 165). According to Allibone (iii. 2468), Buckle wrote in his copy of Trotter's book: 'An ill work by a weak man.'

Trotter's later life was passed in poverty and privation, and in his last years his misfortunes tended to disturb the balance of his mind. In 1813 he made his last political effort while in the Marshalsea at Wexford, writing a pamphlet on the Irish situation, entitled 'Five Letters to Sir William Ousack Smith,' which reached a third edition within the year. He died on 29 Sept. 1818, 'in a decayed house in Hammond's Marsh in Cork,' in unspeakable destitution, the out-patient of a neighbouring dispensary. The misery of his last days was lightened by the devotion of an Irish peasant boy whom he had educated to be his companion, and of his wife, a young woman whom he had married in prison about five years before. In 1819 appeared a series of letters by him, entitled 'Walks through Ireland,' the record of the wanderings of his later years, with a biographical memoir prefixed.

[Memoir prefixed to Walks through Ireland, 1819; Moore's Diary, iii. 129; Records of Trinity College and King's Inns Dublin; Memoirs of Fox; Biogr. Diet. of Living Authors, 1816; Gent. Mag. 1818, p. 472.] F. R.

TROTTER, THOMAS (1760-1832), physician to the fleet and author, born in Roxburghshire in or about 1760, studied medicine in Edinburgh, and at the age of sixteen wrote some verses which were published in Ruddiman's 'Edinburgh Magazine' in 1777 and 1778 (Scorweeds, p. viii). He was, he says, 'early introduced to the medical department of the navy' (ib. p. xiii), and, as surgeon's mate, served in the Berwick in the Channel fleet in 1779 (Observations on the Scurvy, p. 76), and in the battle of the Doggerbank in 1781 (Medica Nautica, i. 812), and apparently, at the relief of Gibraltar in 1782. He was then promoted to be surgeon; but as the reduction of the navy after the peace held out little prospect of employment, he engaged himself as surgeon on board a Liverpool Guineaman, that is a slaver, and had medical charge of a cargo of slaves across to the West Indies. A violent outbreak of scurvy among the negroes on board fixed his attention specially on this disease, with which his service in the Channel fleet had already made him familiar, and when, on his return to England, he settled down in private practice at Wooler in Northumberland, he reduced his notes to order, and published them as 'Observations on the Scurvy' (8vo, 1786; 2nd edit., much enlarged, 1792). The proper treatment of scurvy had already been fully demonstrated by James Lind [q.v.] in his celebrated 'Treatise' of 1751. Trotter corroborated Lind's thesis by extensive observations; but it was not until 1795, and through the instrumentality of Sir Gilbert Blane [q.v.], that the admiralty enjoined the general use of lemon juice as a specific (cf. SPENCER, Study of Sociology, 1880, p. 159).

While on shore Trotter pursued his studies in Edinburgh, and graduated M.D. in 1788, presenting a thesis 'De Ebrietate ejusque effectibus in corpus humanum' (4to), a translation of which he afterwards published as 'An Essay, medical, philosophical, and chomical, on Drunkenness, and its Effects on the Human Body' (8vo, 1804; 4th edit. 1812).

During the Spanish armament of 1790 he was appointed, at the request of Vice-admiral Robert Roddam [q.v.], to be surgeon of his flagship, the Royal William, and in 1793 was surgeon of the Vengeance for a voyage to the West Indies and back. In December he was appointed second physician to the Royal Hospital at Haslar, near Portsmouth, and in April 1794 was nominated by Lord Howe physician to the Channel fleet. In this capacity he served through the campaigns of 1794 and 1795, was present in the battle of 1 June 1794, appears to have been with Cornwallis on 16-17 June 1795, and to have joined the fleet under Lord Bridport very shortly after the action of 23 June. At this time, when going on board one of the ships to visit a wounded officer, he was accidentally ruptured, and rendered incapable of further service at sea (Memorial). He was granted a pension which, with his half-pay and clear of deductions, amounted to 166*l.* a year. In 1805 a considerable addition was made to the half-pay of medical officers, and Trotter memorialised the crown, praying that he might either have the benefit of this increase, or an equivalent addition to his pension. Other physicians of the fleet, he urged, had a half-pay of 382*l.*; he, the only M.D. in the navy, the only one who had ever served under the union flag—the flag of Lord Howe, as admiral of the fleet—had 156*l.* The memorial was referred to the admiralty, who replied that they 'saw no grounds for recommending a compliance with the prayer of the memorialist' (Admiralty, Orders in Council, 7 Nov. 1805).

On retiring from the sea service Trotter settled in private practice at Newcastle, to which, however, after some years, the state of his health, or rather the effects of his injury, rendered him unequal. He continued his literary work, mostly on professional subjects, to the last, and died at Newcastle on 5 Sept. 1832. He does not seem to have been married. His portrait was painted and engraved by Orme in 1796.

His published works are: 1. 'Observations on the Scurvy' (supra). 2. 'De Ebrietate' (ib.). 3. 'A Review of the Medical Department in the British Navy, with a Method of Reform proposed', 1790, 8vo. 4. 'Medical and Chemical Essays, containing additional Observations on Scurvy' . . . 1795, 8vo; 2nd edit. 1796. 5. 'Medica Nautica: an Essay on the Diseases of Seamen,' vol. i. 1797, 8vo; vol. ii. 1799; vol. iii. 1803. 6. 'Suspensa Oceani: a Monody on the death of Richard, Earl Howe,' 1800, 4to. 7. 'An Essay . . . on Drunkenness' (already mentioned). 8. 'A Proposal for destroying the Fire and Chock Damps of Coal Mines' . . . 1805, 8vo. 9. 'A Second Address to the Owners and Agents of Coal Mines on destroying the Fire and Chock Damp,' 1800, 8vo. 10. 'A View of the Nervous Temperament' . . . 1807, 8vo; 2nd edit. 1808. 11. 'The Noble Foundling, or the Hermit of the Tweed: a Tragedy,' 1812, 8vo. 12. 'A practicable Plan for Manning the Royal Navy . . . without Impressment. Addressed to Admiral Lord Viscount Exmouth,' 1819, 8vo. 13. 'Sea Weeds: Poems written on various occasions, chiefly during a naval life,' 1829, crown 8vo, with portrait, an. ret. 3*l.*, presumably after Orme. He contributed also several papers to the 'European Magazine,' 'Medical Journal,' and other periodicals.

[His own works, particularly the preface to Sea Woods; his Memorial, referred to in the text; Gen. Mag. 1832, ii. 476; Watt's Bibl. Brit.; Allibone's Dict. of English Literature; Brit. Mus. Cat.]
J. K. L.

TROUBRIDGE, SIR EDWARD THOMAS (d. 1852), rear-admiral, only son of Rear-admiral Sir Thomas Troubridge [q.v.], entered the navy, in January 1797, on board the Cambridge, guardship at Plymouth, and remained, borne on her books, till April 1799. In January 1801 he joined the Achille, with Captain George Murray, whom he followed to the Edgar, and in her was present in the battle of Copenhagen. He was afterwards moved into the London, and the following year to the Leander. In July 1803 he joined the Victory, flagship of Lord Nelson in the Mediterranean, and in August 1804 was moved from her to the Narcissus frigate. On 22 Feb. 1806 he was promoted to be lieutenant of the Blenheim, going out to the East Indies as flagship of his father, by whom he was appointed to command the Harrier brig. In her, in company with the 32-gun frigate Greyhound, he assisted in destroying a Dutch brig of war under the fort of Manado, on 4 July 1806, and on the 26th in the capture of the 36-gun frigate Pallas and two Indiamen under her convoy. After this Troubridge was appointed captain of the Greyhound. His commission as commander was confirmed on 5 Sept. 1806, that as captain on 28 Nov. 1807. In June 1807, when his letters from the Cape of Good Hope forced the commander-in-chief, Sir Edward Pellew, to fear that the Blenheim (commanded by Troubridge's father) and Java had been lost, Troubridge, in the Greyhound, was ordered to go in search of intelligence, carrying a letter from Pellew to the captain-general of the French settlements. Neither at the French islands nor along the coast of Madagascar was anything to be heard of the missing ships, and this conclusion was unwillingly come to that they had foundered in the hurricane [see TROUBRIDGE, SIR THOMAS]. By the death of his father, Troubridge succeeded to the baronetcy. In the following January he invaded, and had no further services till February 1813, when he commissioned the Armide frigate for the North American station, where he was landed in command of the naval brigade at New Orleans. From April 1831 to October 1832 he was commander-in-chief at Cork, with a broad pennant on board the Stag. From April 1835 to August 1841 he was one of the lords of the admiralty. He was nominated a C.B. on 20 July 1838, and was promoted to be rear-admiral on 23 Nov. 1841. From 1831 to 1847 he was M.P. for Sandwich. He died on 7 Oct. 1862. He married, in October 1810, Anna Marin, daughter of Admiral Sir Alexander Forrester Inglis Cochrane [q. v.], and had issue Sir Thomas St. Vincent Hope Cochrane Troubridge [q. v.]; Edward Norwich Troubridge, a captain in the navy, who died in China in 1850; and two daughters.

[O'Byrne's Naval Biogr. Dict.; Gent. Mag. 1853, i. 197; James's Naval Hist. iv. 162-4.]
J. K. L.

TROUBRIDGE, SIR THOMAS (1758?-1807), rear-admiral, born in London about 1758, was son of Richard Troubridge. He was admitted on the foundation of St. Paul's school, London, on 22 Feb. 1768, 'aged 10' (GARDINER, Register of St. Paul's School, p. 139). It is doubtfully said (Naval Chronicle, xxiii. 1) that he made, as a boy, a voyage to the West Indies in a merchant ship. All that is certainly known is that he entered the navy on board the Seahorse frigate on 8 Oct. 1773, in the rating of 'able seaman,' and was then described as born in London, aged 18. He was three years younger, and the rating may have been nominal. Nelson, who joined the Seahorse a few days later, and was certainly born in 1758, was also entered as aged 18. In the Seahorse Troubridge went out to the East Indies. On 21 March 1771 he was rated midshipman; on 25 July 1770 he was rated master's mate, and on 13 May 1780 he was moved, as a midshipman, into the Superb, flagship of Sir Edward Hughes [q. v.], by whom, on 1 Jan. 1781, he was promoted to be lieutenant of the Chaser, a small vessel which he had bought for the navy, and now newly commissioned. From the Chaser he was moved, two months later, 3 March 1781, to his old ship, the Seahorse, and in her was present in the battle off Sadras on 17 Feb., and in that off Trincomalee on 12 April 1782. On the 18th he was moved as junior lieutenant to the Superb, and in her was present in Hughes's third and fourth actions. By degrees he was moved upwards, till on 10 Oct. he became first lieutenant of the Superb, and on the 11th was promoted to the command of the Lizard sloop. On 1 Jan. 1783 he was posted to the Active frigate, and in her was present in Hughes's fifth action off Cuddalore. He was afterwards moved into the Defence, and later on into the Sultan, as flag-captain to Hughes, with whom he came home in 1785.

In 1790 he went out again to the East Indies in the Thames frigate, and on his return to England was appointed to the Castor frigate of 32 guns, which, in May 1794, had the ill luck to fall in with a division of the Brest fleet and be captured. Troubridge, as a prisoner, was moved into the French 80-gun ship Sanspareil, and in her was bodily present in the battle of 1 June. The Sanspareil was captured, and Troubridge, on his return in her to England, was appointed to the 74-gun ship Culloden, in which early in 1795 he went out to the Mediterranean, and was present in the unsatisfactory action off the Hyères on 18 July. In the Culloden he continued in the Mediterranean under the command of Sir John Jervis (afterwards Earl of St. Vincent) [q. v.], and led the line in the battle of Cape St. Vincent, 14 Feb. 1797, when his gallant bearing and determined conduct called forth an expression of warm approval from the admiral.

In July the Culloden, with a few other ships, was detached under the orders of Nelson for an attack on Santa Cruz. While yet some distance from the town a thousand men, detailed for the landing party, were put on board the frigates, and sent in under the immediate command of Troubridge, in the hope of surprising the fort above the town during the night. The approach of the frigates was delayed by foul wind and tide, and day dawned before they got within a mile of the landing-place. As surprise was now out of the question, Troubridge rejoined the squadron, which had closely followed the frigates, and told Nelson that he thought that by seizing the heights above the fort it could be compelled to surrender. Nelson assented, and at nine o'clock the men were landed. The enemy, however, had occupied the heights in force, and the attempt was unsuccessful. At nightfall Troubridge re-embarked the men, and the next day Nelson recalled them to their own ships. In describing this affair Captain Mahan has contrasted Troubridge's 'failure to act at once upon his own judgment' with Nelson's independent 'action at St. Vincent and on many other occasions' (Life of Nelson, i. 301), but has apparently overlooked the fact that the details of the landing had been agreed on in private conversation with his admiral, and that Troubridge had thus less discretionary power than an officer could have when no details had been settled. When this plan of attack was given up, it was resolved to attempt landing at the molo by night; but this met with very partial success. Several of the boats missed the molo, or were broken up in the surf, and at daylight Troubridge, who was left on shore in command (see NELSON, HORATIO, VISCOUNT), found himself in presence of a numerically overwhelming force of men and guns. It is very probable that the men were for the most part a very raw militia, and that the guns had no competent gunners, so that when Troubridge sent Captain (afterwards Sir Samuel) Hood to offer a cessation of hostilities, on the condition of being permitted to embark his men without hindrance, the governor of the town readily and indeed cheerfully agreed to the terms.

In the following year the Culloden was again one of the squadron detached to serve under Nelson in the Mediterranean, and took part in the search for the French fleet which proceeded and led up to the battle of the Nile. On the evening of 1 Aug., when the squadron was approaching the French fleet, seen some distance astern, was pressing on to get into station, the Culloden struck heavily on the shoal which runs out from Aboukir Island, and there remained. All Troubridge's efforts to get her afloat seemed in vain, and he had the pain of seeing the battle without being able to take part in it. The next day the ship was got off, but in a sinking state. She was making seven feet of water in an hour, and her rudder had been torn off. Troubridge, however, was a man of energy and resource, and managed to patch her up sufficiently to enable her to go to Naples, where she was refitted. In accordance with Nelson's very strong wish, Troubridge was given the gold medal for the battle, and the first lieutenant of the Culloden was promoted after a short delay. At Naples and off Malta Troubridge's services were closely mixed up with those of Nelson. In the end of 1798 he was sent to command the small squadron on the coast of Egypt, but rejoined Nelson in March 1799, when he was again detached to take possession of Ischia, Procida, and Capri, and to maintain the blockade of the Bay of Naples. In June he was landed at Naples for the siege of St. Elmo, which he reduced, and afterwards did Capua and Gaeta, and Civita Vecchia, securing the evacuation of the Roman territory by the French. In recognition of these services he received the order of St. Ferdinand and Merit from the king of the Two Sicilies, and was created a baronet on 30 Nov. 1799. He was then sent as senior officer off Malta, and, though occasionally visited by Keith or by Nelson, had virtually the command of the blockade till May 1800, when the Culloden was ordered home.

Troubridge was then for a few months captain of the Channel fleet off Brest, under Lord St. Vincent, with whom, in March 1801, he became a lord of the admiralty, and with whom he retired from the admiralty in May 1804. On 23 April 1804 he had been promoted to the rank of rear-admiral. In April 1805 he was appointed to the chief command in East Indian seas, to the eastward of Point de Galle, and went out with his flag in the Blenheim, an old worn-out ship, formerly a three-decker, which had been cut down and now carried seventy-four guns. Shortly after passing Madagascar, and having with him a convoy of ten Indiamen, he fell in with the French admiral, Linois, in the Marengo, with two large frigates in company. Linois, probably mistaking the Blenheim for an Indianman, approached, with a view to seize so rich a prize, but, finding out his mistake, and notwithstanding the disparity of force, hauled his wind and made off. Even had the Blenheim been a ship to chase with, Troubridge would not have felt justified in leaving the convoy; as it was, he had also the certain knowledge that the chase would be useless. He pursued his voyage and joined Sir Edward Pellew [q. v.] till then commander-in-chief in East India and China. Pellew was strongly convinced of the inadvisability of dividing the station, when the exigencies of war might make prompt action under one commander essential to success; and as Troubridge, properly enough, maintained that they had no power, by any agreement between themselves, to alter the disposition of the admiralty, Pellew referred the matter to them, with a full statement of his reasons. The result was an order to Pellew to resume command of the whole station, and to Troubridge to take the chief command at the Cape of Good Hope.

Meantime the Blenheim had been ashore in the Straits of Malacca, and had sustained so much damage that in the opinion of many of her officers she was no longer seaworthy; and when, after much difficulty, she arrived at Madras to refit, her captain, Bissell, represented that there would be great danger in attempting to take her to the Cape. Troubridge, however, had great confidence in himself, and was probably unwilling to remain on Pellew's station longer than necessary. There had been no quarrel, but by the blunder of the admiralty the relations between them were not altogether friendly. He insisted on sailing at once in the Blenheim, and such confidence was reposed in his ability that many passengers from Madras embarked in her. She left Madras on 12 Jan. 1807, and with her the Java, an old Dutch prize frigate, and the Harrier brig. On 1 Feb., near the south-east end of Madagascar, they got into a cyclone, from which the Harrier alone emerged. When last seen by her, both the Blenheim and Java had hoisted signals of distress; but the Harrier herself was in great danger and could do nothing. She lost eight of them in a violent squall, and there can be no doubt that they both foundered. When the news reached the East India, Pellew sent Troubridge's son, then in command of the Greyhound, to make inquiries as to the fate of the ships. The French governor of Mauritius gave him every assistance in his power, and sent an account of pieces of wreck which had been cast ashore in different places; but nothing could be identified as belonging to either of the missing ships, nothing that could give any positive information as to their fate.

Troubridge married, about 1786, Mrs. Frances Richardson, and left issue a daughter, besides one son, Edward Thomas Troubridge, the heir to the baronetcy, who is separately noticed.

An anonymous portrait of Troubridge belonged in 1868 to Captain F. P. Egerton, R.N.

[Ralph's Nav. Biogr. iv. 397; official letters, pay-books, and logs in the Public Record Office; Nicolas's Letters and Despatches of Viscount Nelson, passim; Clarke and McArthur's Life of Nelson; James's Naval History. Troubridge's correspondence with Nelson (1797-1800) has been recently acquired by the British Museum (Addit. MSS. 34902, 34906-17).] J. K. L.

TROUBRIDGE, SIR THOMAS ST. VINCENT HOPE COCHRANE (1815-1867), colonel, born on 25 May 1815, was eldest son of Admiral Sir Edward Thomas Troubridge [q. v.] (second baronet), by Anna Maria, daughter of Admiral Sir Alexander Forrester Inglis Cochrane [q. v.]. He was commissioned as ensign in the 73rd foot on 24 Jan. 1834. On 30 Dec. 1836 he was promoted lieutenant and exchanged into the 7th royal fusiliers. He served with this regiment at Gibraltar, the West Indies, and Canada, becoming captain on 14 Dec. 1841, and major on 9 Aug. 1850.

He went with it to the Crimea in 1854, and was in the forefront of the battle at the Alma. He was in command of the right wing of the regiment, which was on the right of the light division, and had to deal with the left wing of the Kazan regiment. On 6 Nov. (Inkerman) he was field officer of the day, and was posted with the reserve of the light division in the Lancaster battery. This battery was enfiladed by Russian guns to the east of the Careenage ravine, and Troubridge lost his right leg and left foot by a shot from one of these guns. He remained in the battery, however, till the battle was over, with his limbs propped up against a gun-carriage. Lord Raglan, in his despatch of 11 Nov., said of him that, though desperately wounded, he behaved with the utmost gallantry and composure.

He returned to England in May 1855, and was present (in a chair) at the distribution of medals by the queen on 18 May. He was made C.B., aide-de-camp to the queen, and brevet colonel from that day, having already been made brevet lieutenant-colonel on 12 Dec. 1854. He also received the Crimean medal with clasps, the Turkish medal, the Medjidie (4th class), and the Legion of Honour.

He succeeded to the command of his regiment on 9 March 1855, but was unable to serve with it, and was placed on half-pay on 14 Sept. Still capable of official work, he was appointed director-general of army clothing. On 2 Feb. 1857 he exchanged this title for that of deputy adjutant-general (clothing department), and he continued to hold this post till his death. Struck by the defects of the regulation knapsack of that day, he contrived a valise which met with the warm approval of the leading medical officers (R. U. S. Institution Journal, viii. 118), and may be said to have been the foundation of the present valise equipment. He died at Kensington on 2 Oct. 1867, and was buried at Kensal Green.

He married, on 1 Nov. 1855, Louisa Jane, daughter of Daniel Gurney of North Runcton, Norfolk, and granddaughter of the fifteenth Earl of Erroll. She died five weeks before him. He left two sons and four daughters.

[Gent. Mag. 1867, ii. 876; Foster's Baronetage; Kinglake's Invasion of the Crimea; Walker's Historical Records of the Royal Fusiliers.]

E. M. L.

TROUGHTON, EDWARD (1753-1835), scientific instrument maker, was born in the parish of Corney, Cumberland, in October 1753. His family sprang from Lancaster, and many of them were freemen of that town. Edward (who was enrolled a freeman in 1779) was the third son of Francis Troughton, described as a 'husbandman,' and was destined for the same way of life. His eldest brother, John Troughton, had, however, set up as a mechanician in London, and on the death, in 1770, of the second brother, Joseph, Edward replaced him as John's apprentice. At the expiry of his term he was admitted to partnership, and the firm started independently as successors to the well-known mechanicians Wright & Cole. After the death of John Troughton a couple of years later, Edward carried on the business alone until 1823, when he took William Simms (1793-1860) into partnership. During a visit to Paris in 1825 he received much attention from men of science, and the king of Denmark sent him a gold medal in 1830. An original member of the Royal Astronomical Society, he regularly attended, undeterred by his deafness, the meetings of its council. He was elected a fellow of the Royal Societies of London and Edinburgh in 1810 and 1822 respectively.

Absorbed in his art, Troughton led a simple and frugal life, desirous rather of fame than of profit. Liberal in professional communications, he showed feelings of rivalry only towards Jesse Ramsden [q. v.] In manner he was blunt and outspoken; in person slovenly. Towards the last he was seldom absent from his dingy back-parlour at 136 Fleet Street, where he sat with a huge ear-trumpet at hand, wearing clothes stained with sunff and a soiled wig. He died on 12 June 1835, and was buried in Kensal Green cemetery.

Although precluded from optical work by the family defect of colour blindness, Troughton's inventions and amendments covered a very wide field. The most important of them was a new mode of graduating arcs of circles — 'the greatest improvement,' according to Sir George Airy, 'ever made in the art of instrument-making' (Report Brit. Association, i. 132). He devised it in 1778; 'but as my brother,' he wrote, 'could not readily be persuaded to relinquish to me a branch of this business in which he himself excelled, it was not until 1785 that I produced my first specimen by dividing an astronomical quadrant of two feet radius.' He received the Copley medal for his description of the method before the Royal Society on 2 Feb. 1809 (Phil. Trans. xcix. 105).

The first modern transit-circles was constructed by Troughton in 1806 for Stephen Groombridge [q. v.] But he disliked the type, and broke to pieces another example of it, after it had cost him 150*l.*, saying, 'I was afraid I might become covetous as I grew old, and so be tempted to finish it.' So he contrived instead the mural circle, with which, by a valuable innovation, polar distances were measured directly from the pole. One of those circles, six feet in diameter, erected by him at Greenwich in 1812, continued in use until 1851, and is preserved in the transit room. Instruments of the same kind were sent by him to the observatories of Paris, the Cape, St. Helena, Madras, Cracow, Odiz, Brussels, Edinburgh, Armagh, and Cambridge. His large transits were of great beauty and finish. The most notable were those procured for Greenwich in 1816, and by Sir James South [q. v.] in 1820. The Greenwich twenty-five foot zenith telescope was also by him. Towards the end of his life, however, the practical execution of his designs devolved mainly upon Simms. The best known of his altazimuth circles belonged to Count Brühl [see BRÜHL, JOHN MAURICE, COUNT OF], John Pond [q. v.], Sir Thomas Brisbane, John Lee (1783-1866) [q. v.], and Dr. William Pearson. He mounted small telescopes equatorially for the observatories of Coimbra (in 1788), of Armagh and Brussels; but his failure with South's twelve-inch proved disastrous to the peace of his later years.

Troughton made the 'beam compass' and hydrostatic balance,' with which Sir George Shuckburgh [see SHUCKBURGH-EVELYN, SIR GEORGE AUGUSTUS WILLIAM] experimented on weights and measures in 1798 (Phil. Trans. lxxxviii. 137). He also constructed the apparatus used by Francis Baily [q.v.] in restoring the standard yard. His theodolites were of remarkable perfection, and he supplied the instrumental outfit for the American coast survey (1815), the Irish and Indian arc-measurements (1822 and 1829), and other famous geodetical operations. He took particular pains to meet the requirements of seamen. 'Your fancies can wait,' he would say to importunate customers, 'their necessities cannot.' His sextants were long in almost exclusive use, and he invented in 1788 the 'double-framed sextant.' He also devised the dipsector, and (in 1796) the 'British reflecting circle'; besides materially improving the marine and mountain barometers, the compensated mercurial pendulum, the 'marine top,' 'snuff-box sextant,' portable universal dial, and pyrometer. The substitution of spider lines for wires in filar micrometers was due to him.

Troughton read a paper on the repeating circle before the Astronomical Society on 12 Jan. 1821 (Memoirs, i. 33), and contributed to Brewster's 'Edinburgh Cyclopaedia' articles on the 'Circle,' 'Graduation,' and other subjects. He wrote besides, in his curt clear style, most of the descriptions of his instruments inserted in astronomical publications. Pearson dedicated to him the second volume of his 'Practical Astronomy' (1829). Troughton was unmarried, and his freehold of Welcome Nook in his native parish was inherited by his sister, Mrs. Suddard, and is possessed by her descendants. In the cottage garden there, and in the graveyard of Ooroy, stand sundials said to have been made by him. A marble bust of him by Sir Francis Chantry, subscribed for by his friends, was placed at his desire in the Royal Observatory, Greenwich.

[Monthly Notices Roy. Astr. Soc. iii. 149 (Sheepshanks); a list of references to the published descriptions of Troughton's instruments is given at p. 154; Lonsdale's Worthies of Cumberland, vi. 113; Grant's Hist. of Astronomy, p. 491; Annual Biogr. and Obit. xx. 471; Ann. Reg. 1835, p. 223; Poggendorff's Biogr.-Lit. Handwörterbuch; information from Mr. J. S. Singer.] A. M. C.

TROUGHTON, JOHN (1637?-1681), nonconformist divine, son of Nathaniel Troughton, clothier, was born at Coventry about 1637. At four years old he became permanently blind from the effect of small-pox. He was educated at King Henry VIII's grammar school, Coventry, under Samuel Frankland (1618?-1691), and not, as Foster says, at Merchant Taylors' school. He entered as a scholar at St. John's College, Oxford, in 1655 (matriculated 28 March), graduated B.A. on 12 Feb. 1658-9, and was elected to a fellowship, but did not long hold it, his predecessor, displaced in 1648, being restored in 1660. Retiring to Bicester, Oxfordshire, he took pupils, and engaged in conventicle preaching. Under the indulgence of 1672 he joined Henry Langley [q.v.], Thomas Gilbert (1613-1694) [q.v.], and Henry Cornish in ministering to a nonconformist congregation which met in Thame Street, Oxford. Troughton was reckoned the best preacher of the four in spite of his blindness. Wood describes him as 'learned and religious,' his moderation kept him on good terms with clergy of the established church. He died in All Saints' parish, Oxford, on 20 Aug. 1681, aged 44, and was buried on 22 Aug. in Bicester church. His funeral sermon was preached by Abraham James, the blind headmaster of Woodstock grammar school, and contained reflections on constituted authorities which James retracted to avoid expulsion from his mastership.

Troughton published: 1. 'The Covenant Interest . . . of . . . Infants,' 1675, 8vo. 2. 'Lutherus Redivivus,' 1677, 8vo; 2nd part, 1678, 8vo (on justification by faith; answered by Thomas Hotchkiss). 3. 'A Letter . . . touching God's Providence about Sinful Actions,' 1678, 8vo. 4. 'Popery, the Grand Apostasie,' 1680, 8vo. 5. 'An Apologie for the Nonconformists,' 1681, 4to (included is 'An Answer' to Stillingfleet).

His son, John Troughton (1686-1739), was dissenting minister at Bicester from 1696, and published several sermons (1703-25). He died on 3 Dec. 1739, aged 73.

[Wood's Athens Oxon. (Bliss), vol. i. p. xcii; iv. 9, 407; Calamy's Account, 1713, p. 68; Calamy's Continuation, 1727, i. 101; Foster's Alumni Oxon. 1892, iv. 1513; Oxford Free Church Magazine, October 1897, p. 68.] A. G.

TROUGHTON, WILLIAM (1614?-1677?), nonconformist divine, son of William Troughton, rector of Waberthwaite, Cumberland, was born about 1614. He matriculated at Queen's College, Oxford, on 24 Oct. 1634, aged 20. In 1647 he was chaplain to Robert Hammond [q.v.], governor of the Isle of Wight, when Charles I is said to have held affable discussions with him. A ludicrous story is told of his alarm at the bringing in of a sword for the knight-riding of John Duncomb. In 1651 he held the rectory of Wanlip, Leicestershire, but soon afterwards obtained the vicarage of St. Martin, Salisbury, and took an active part in suppressing the royalist insurrection in that city on 11 March 1651-6. He was probably ejected at the Restoration, and preached privately as an independent at Salisbury. He is said to have been a glover, perhaps engaging in this business after ejection. In 1662 he removed to Bristol and preached there. Subsequently he removed to London. He is not heard of after 1677.

He published: 1. 'Saints in England under a Cloud,' 1648, 8vo. 2. 'Scripture Redemption . . . limited,' 1652, 8vo (answered by James Browne). 3. 'The Mystery of the Marriage Song,' 1656, 8vo (exposition of Ps. xlv.) 4. 'Causes and Cures of Sad . . . Thoughts,' 1676, 12mo; 1677, 12mo.

[Wood's Athenæ Oxon. (Bliss), iv. 9, 407; Calamy's Account, 1713, p. 756; Foster's Alumni Oxon. 1892, iv. 1513.] A. C.

TROY, JOHN THOMAS (1730-1823), Roman catholic archbishop of Dublin, was born at Porterstown, a village near Dublin, on 10 May 1739. At fifteen he left Ireland to study at Rome, where he joined the Dominican order in 1756. He passed several years at Rome, and became rector of St. Clement's in that city. In 1776 Troy was appointed to succeed Dr. Do Hurgh as bishop of Ossory, and was consecrated at Louvain by the archbishop of Mechlin. From the commencement of his episcopate Troy proved himself the steady friend of the constituted authorities, and in 1779 and 1784 issued circulars to his clergy condemning Whiteboyism, and pronouncing excommunication against those in his diocese who should join the Whitoboy societies—a service for which he received the thanks of the lord lieutenant. In 1784, on the death of Dr. Carpenter, Troy was translated to the archbishopric of Dublin, where he maintained the same attitude towards all unconstitutional and treasonable movements, and was on terms of friendly co-operation throughout his episcopate with the authorities at Dublin Castle. Though his circular, issued on 15 March 1792, disavowing the authority of any ecclesiastical power to absolve subjects from their allegiance, is believed to have influenced the concession in that year of the relaxations embodied in Langrishe's Act, and the extension of the franchise to Roman catholics in 1793, he declined to associate himself with John Keogh (1740-1817) [q. v.] and the catholic reformers in their demands for further relief, reminding his flock that they owed their improved position to a 'most gracious king and most wise Parliament,' and holding that further concessions would be won more readily by loyal submission than by agitation. In 1795 he publicly denounced defenderism throughout his archdiocese, and, though he was said to have joined the United Irish organisation, there is no authority for this statement, which is quite inconsistent with his policy. In 1798, in a pastoral read in all the churches, he spoke of the clerical organisers of the rebellion as 'vile perverters and apostates from religion, loyalty, honour, and decorum, degrading their sacred character, and the most criminal and detestable of rebellious and seditious culprits.' Troy's action at this time appears to have endangered his life; but the influence he had acquired with the government enabled him to moderate the repressive measures taken by the authorities. Believing that catholic emancipation could never be conceded by the Irish parliament, Troy warmly supported the proposal for a union in 1799, and his active assistance greatly smoothed the passage of the act of union in the following year. For his services to government in this connection he received a pension from the government.

Like most of the Roman catholic clergy educated abroad before the French revolution, Troy viewed with great disapprobation and alarm the growth of popular principles, and entered heartily into the policy of educating the priesthood at home, to which the foundation of Maynooth College was due. He likewise promoted a scheme for the endowment of the Roman catholic clergy, and in 1799 concurred in a series of resolutions of the catholic hierarchy calling for a measure of this kind, and recognising the principle of government intervention in the appointment of catholic clergy.

In 1809, in consequence of failing health, Daniel Murray [q. v.] was appointed his coadjutor, with the right of succession to his see, but Troy continued for many years to fill his office. In April 1815 he laid the foundation-stone of the pro-cathedral at Marlborough Street, Dublin, where, on his death on 11 May 1823, he was interred. His died very poor, leaving scarce sufficient to pay for his burial, and Moore notes in his diary the contrast between 'the two archbishops who died lately—him of Armagh (William Stuart), whose income was 20,000*l.* a year, and who left 180,000*l.* behind him; and Troy, the Roman catholic archbishop of Dublin, whose annual income was 800*l.*, and who died not worth a ten penny.'

In the administration of his diocese and in his private life Troy was eminently zealous, pious, and charitable; and although his cordial relations with the government exposed him to many suspicious and accusations, there is no ground for questioning the integrity of his motives and conduct, which were inspired by his views of the interest of his church. He fully shared that distrust of revolutionary tendencies in civil affairs which dominated the ecclesiastical policy of the Vatican throughout his career.

[D'Alton's Lives of the Archbishops of Dublin; Webb's Compendium of Irish Biography; Bishop Doyle by Michael McDonagh; Castlereagh Correspondence; Cornwallis Correspondence; Lecky's Hist. of England in the Eighteenth Century; Froude's English in Ireland; Wyse's Historical Sketch of the Catholic Association, i. 163; Diary and Correspondence of Lord Colchester; Will's Lives of Illustrious Irishmen.]

C. J. F.

TRUBBEVILLE or TRUBLEVILLE, HENRY DU (d. 1239), seneschal of Gascony. [See TURNERVILLE.]

TRÜBNER, NICHOLAS (NIKOLAUS), (1817-1884), publisher, the eldest of four sons of a Heidelberg goldsmith, was born at Heidelberg on 17 June 1817, and educated at the gymnasium. He early showed an eager taste for study, and his parents, being unable to afford him a university training, placed him in 1831 in the shop of Mohr, the Heidelberg bookseller. Six years' hard work there brought him into contact with many learned men, and successive employment with Vandenhoeck and Ruprecht at Tübingen, Hoffmann and Campe at Hamburg, and Wilmann at Frankfurt, completed his experience and widened his acquaintance with German literature and scholars. At Frankfurt William Longman (see under LONGMAN, THOMAS) was struck with young Trübner's ability, and offered him the post of foreign corresponding clerk in his own business. It was eagerly accepted, and Nicholas arrived in London in 1843 with 30s. in his pocket. At Longman's he soon learnt the English language and book trade, and prepared himself for the position of a leading publisher.

In 1851 he entered into partnership with Thomas Delf, who had succeeded to Wiley & Putnam's American literary agency, but at first the venture failed. On David Nutt's joining him, however, the business was placed on a sound footing, and the American trade was developed. After publishing in 1855 his model 'Bibliographical Guide to American Literature' (four years later expanded to five times its original size), Trübner visited the United States and formed permanent connections with leading American writers and publishers. In 1857 he edited and augmented his friend Hermann Ludewig's manuscript work, 'The Literature of American Aboriginal Languages.' But though he maintained his American connections to the last, as his business expanded Trübner was able to indulge his passion for severer literature. His deepest interest was in philology, philosophy, religions, and, most of all, oriental studies. In spite of the claims of business, he had found time in London to study Sanskrit under Goldstücker and Hebrew with Benisch. As an orientalist himself, a competent critic, and an excellent bibliographer, he brought to the furtherance of his favourite subjects not merely enthusiasm, but critical judgment and a shrewd business mind. His success in gathering round him a band of distinguished scholars, and publishing learned works which other publishers would scarcely have risked, soon made his name a household word wherever oriental scholarship is known, and his fame in India, America, and the continent rests chiefly upon the enterprise and judgment he displayed in this line of publications. On 16 March 1865 appeared the first monthly number of 'Trübner's American and Oriental Record,' which did invaluable service in keeping scholars all over the world in touch with him and with each other. In 1878 began the issue of 'Trübner's Oriental Series,' a collection of works by the leading authorities on all branches of Eastern learning, of which he lived to see nearly fifty volumes published. His 'British and Foreign Philosophical Library' fulfilled a similar purpose for another branch of study. His keen interest in linguistic research led to his preparing in 1872 his 'Catalogue of Dictionaries and Grammars of the principal Languages and Dialects of the World,' of which an enlarged edition appeared in 1882. He also published numerous useful class catalogues of various languages and branches of study. He was publisher for government state papers and for various learned societies, such as the Royal Asiatic and the Early English Text, and added to these the ordinary business of a general publisher and foreign agent.

His own works include, besides the catalogues and bibliographies already mentioned, translations from the Flemish of Hendrik Conscience's 'Sketches of Flemish Life,' 1846, from the German of part of Bruunhofer's 'Life of Giordano Bruno,' Scheffel's 'Die Schweden in Rippoldsau,' and Eckstein's 'Eternal Laws of Morality;' and a memoir of Joseph Octave Delepierro, Belgian consul in London, whose daughter he married. He also collected materials for a history of classical book selling.

As a rare combination of scholar, author, and publisher, Trübner held a unique position and exerted a remarkable influence. His house was the resort of men of learning of all nations and distinguished people of all kinds. Douglas Jerrold, G. H. Lewes, Hepworth Dixon, W. R. Greg, J. Doran, Bret Harte were among his intimates, and, referring to his social charms, Louis Blano said, 'Trübner est une bouche d'or.' His scholarly ardour and enthusiasm for learning, and still more his kindness and sympathy, endeared him to a wide circle, who found in him a staunch, generous, and warm-hearted friend. Many a struggling scholar owed his final success to Trübner's practical help and steady encouragement. His services to learning were recognised by foreign rulers, who bestowed on him the orders of the crown of Prussia, Ernestine Branch of Saxony, Francis Joseph of Austria, St. Olaf of Norway, the Lion of Zähringen, and the White Elephant of Siam. He died at his residence, 29 Upper Hamilton Terrace, Maida Vale, on 30 March 1884, leaving one daughter.

[Personal knowledge; A. H. Sayce in Trübner's Record, No. 197, April 1884; Karl J. Trübner in Centralblatt für Bibliothekswesen, June 1884; Allgemeine Zeitung, 19 April 1884; W. A. E. Axon in Library Chronicle, April 1884; Athenæum, 5 April 1884; Bookseller, April 1884; Annual Report of Royal Asiatic Soc. 1884.]

S. L. P.

TRUBSHAW, JAMES (1777-1853), engineer, born at Mount Pleasant (now Colwich) Priory in Staffordshire on 13 Feb. 1777, was the son of James Trubshaw, a stonemason and builder of Colwich, by his second wife, Elizabeth, daughter of John Webb of Lovedale. He was educated at a school at Rugeley. At the age of sixteen, through the father of Sir Richard Westmacott (1775-1866) [q. v.], he obtained employment at Fonthill Abbey, the residence of William Beckford (1759-1844) [q. v.], which was then in course of erection, at Duckingham Palace, and at Windsor Castle. In 1795 he obtained employment in the construction of Walsley Bridge, near Colwich, which his father had been commissioned to rebuild. After his father's death on 18 April 1808 he commenced business on his own account at Stono, and was fortunate enough to attract the attention of Mrs. Sneyd, a lady residing in the neighbourhood, who commissioned him to rebuild Ashcombe Hall. The manner in which he carried out this undertaking procured him other employments and established his reputation locally.

In 1827 he undertook to construct the Grosvenor Bridge over the Dee at Chester, after the design of Thomas Harrison (1744-1830) [q. v.]. The bridge consisted of a single arch of two hundred feet span, and its construction was pronounced by Thomas Telford [q. v.] and other leading engineers to be impracticable. The first stone was laid in October 1837 and the bridge opened in December 1838. Models of the bridge, illustrative of the methods of construction employed, were presented by Trubshaw to the Society of Civil Engineers, of which he was a member. Among the buildings erected by Trubshaw were Ham Hall, near Ashbourne, after the design of John Shaw (1776-1832) [q. v.], and Weston House in Warwickshire, after the design of Edward Blore [q. v.]. He constructed the Exeter Bridge over the Derwent at Derby, opened in October 1850, a work which presented peculiar difficulties on account of the sudden floods with which it was assailed, and the quicksands encountered in the middle of the river. He was also successful in restoring the church tower of Wyburnbury in Cheshire to the perpendicular, from which it had declined more than five feet. To effect this he employed specially constructed gouges, with which he removed the earth under the higher side. He was for a time engineer to the Trent and Mersey Canal Company, and their works bear many traces of his originality and skill.

Trubshaw died on 28 Oct. 1853 at Colwich, and was buried in the churchyard. In 1800 he married Mary, youngest daughter of Thomas Bott of Stono. By her he had three sons and three daughters. Their eldest son, Thomas, born on 4 April 1802, was an architect of considerable ability; he died on 7 June 1842. Their daughter, Susanna Trubshaw, was the author of a volume of 'Poems' (Stafford, 1863, 8vo). In 1874 she edited 'Wayside Inns' (Stafford, 8vo), a selection of poems and essays, partly of her own composition, and in 1876 published 'Family Records' (Stafford, 8vo).

[Susanna Trubshaw's Family Records; Memoir by John Miller in Gent. Mag. 1864, i. 97-101.] E. I. C.

TRUMAN, JOSEPH (1631-1671), ejected minister and metaphysician, son of Richard and Mary Truman, was born at Godding, near Nottingham, and baptised there on 2 Feb. 1630-1. His father, who held some public post in the place, got into difficulties by speaking disrespectfully of the 'Book of Sports.'

Joseph was educated first by the minister of Gedling, and afterwards at the free school at Nottingham. He was admitted a pensioner at Clare College, Cambridge, on 9 June 1647, proceeded B.A. in 1650, and M.A. in 1654. He was made rector of Cromwell, near Nottingham (probably by the assembly of divines, as his name does not appear on the institution books), some time after 4 Dec. 1656, when the former 'minister of Cromwell' (Henry Trewman, instituted 27 July 1635) was buried. The similarity in the two names (or possibly identity with a variation in the spelling) suggests a family connection.

After the passing of the Act of Uniformity in 1662, Truman, according to Calamy, declined to read the whole of the service in the Book of Common Prayer, because, he said, there were 'lies in it;' to prove his assertion, he quoted the collect for Christmas Day, and pointed out that not only was the birth of Christ stated to have taken place on that day, but also on the following Sunday. The collect is said to have been amended in consequence, but in reality it had already been altered by the Savoy conference in 1661. Truman's successor in the rectory was instituted on 3 Nov. 1662.

After his ejection he resided in Mansfield in order to be near his friend Robert Porter, and always attended the services of the established church. He refused, however, all offers of preferment, was frequently indicted for nonconformity, and was once unsuccessfully sued to an outlawry.

He died at Sutton in Bedfordshire on 19 July 1671, and was buried in the chancel of the church there on 21 July.

In 1669 Truman published anonymously his first work, 'The Great Propitiation,' in which he endeavoured to explain the Apostle Paul's theory of justification without works. He attached to his work (also anonymously) 'A Discourse concerning the Apostle Paul's meaning of "Justification by Faith,"' in which he maintained that it was not intended 'to exclude repentance and sincere obedience from being a condition of our justification,' but that they were indeed included in the meaning of the word 'faith.' 'The Great Propitiation' reappeared in London in 1671, 1672, and 1643. On the appearance early in 1670 of Bishop Bull's 'Harmonia Apostolica,' Truman felt that many of his positions were seriously assailed, and commenced at once to write an answer in English for private circulation. It was, however, published anonymously under the title of 'An Endeavour to rectify some prevailing Opinions contrary to the Doctrine of the Church of England' (London, 1671). Truman's main contention was the all-sufficiency of the Mosaic law, which, he argued, was able not only to work true sanctification in man, but, if rightly interpreted, to insure eternal life. Interpreted as a law of grace, it was no type or shadow, but the very gospel itself, to which the sermon on the Mount had added nothing essential, and which remained in force to the present day.

In the same year (1671) Truman, still with Bull's views in mind, published anonymously 'A Discourse of Natural and Moral Impotency,' in which he contended that whereas natural inability excuses from blame or guilt in proportion to its extent, moral inability aggravates it in like proportion, consisting as it does in aversion of the will. The book was republished with the writer's name in 1675 and again in 1684. Bull answered Truman at some length in his 'Examen Ceneure,' pp. 149 et seq.

Truman's writings all exhibit close, subtle argumentation. He was a man of unusual learning and untiring diligence and industry.

[Palmer's Nonconformist's Memorial, iii. 93; Wood's Athenæ (Bliss), vol. iv. col. 491; Kennett's Register, pp. 816, 907, 913; Truman's Works, passim; Rogers's Biographical Introduction to Discourse on Natural and Moral Impotency, 1684; Troughton's Lutherus Redivivus, i. 8, 9, 211, 214, 232, ii. 72-3; Nelson's Life of Bull, pp. 162-205; Institutions in Public Record Office and York Diocesan Registry; private information.] B. P.

TRUMBULL, WILLIAM (d. 1685), diplomatist, was son of John Trumbull of Craven, Yorkshire, and his wife, Elizabeth Brogden or Briggden. He seems to have been introduced at court by Sir Thomas Edmondee [q. v.], whom he afterwards described as his 'old master.' Early in James I's reign he was a court messenger, and probably he was attached to Edmondee's embassy to the Archduke Albert of Austria, regent of the Netherlands. When Edmondee was recalled from Brussels in 1609, Trumbull was promoted to succeed him as resident at the archduke's court. He retained that difficult post for sixteen years, and his correspondence is a valuable source for the diplomatic history of the period; his salary was twenty shillings a day. On 6 June 1611 he was instructed to demand the extradition of William Seymour and Arabella Stuart should they land in the archduke's dominions. On 17 Feb. 1613-14, after repeated solicitation, he was granted an ordinary clerkship to the privy council; but the office seems to have been a sinecure, for Trumbull remained at his post at Brussels. In 1620 he protested against the Spanish invasion of the Palatinate (GARDNER, iii. 361-2). In 1624 he requested the reversion 'of one of the six clerks' places' for himself and a clerkship of the privy seal for his eldest son. He was recalled in 1625 on the open rupture with Spain (ib. vi. 6), and on 10 Feb. 1625-6 he was returned to parliament for Downton, Wiltshire. He assumed active duties as clerk of the privy council, devoting himself especially to naval matters. On 26 March 1628 he was granted Easthampstead Park, Berkshire, on condition of maintaining a deer-park for the king's recreation. Soon afterwards he was appointed muster-master-general. He died in London in September 1635, being succeeded as clerk to the council by his godson (Sir) Edward Nicholas [q. v.], and was buried in Easthampstead church, where a monument was erected to his memory. His portrait, painted in 1617, was engraved by Vertue in 1726 (BROOKER, Cat. Engr. Portraits, p. 80). By his wife Deborah, daughter of Walter Downes of Boltring, Kent, he left issue two sons and two daughters. The elder son, William (1594?-1668), was father of Sir William Trumbull [q. v.]

Trumbull's correspondence is extant in Brit. Mus. Egerton MSS. 2592-6, Cotton MS. Galba E i., Stowe MSS. 171-176, and the manuscripts of Mr. George Wingfield Digby at Sherborne Castle, Dorset (Hist. MSS. Comm. 10th Rep. App. pp. 623-610). Many of the letters were printed in Winwood's 'Memorials' (of which they form a considerable part), and in Digges's 'Complient Ambassador,' ii. 350-8. While at Brussels he secured the valuable secret correspondence between Francisco Vargas and Cardinal Granvelle on the council of Trent; an English translation was published in 1697 by Michael Geddes [q. v.], and a French by Michel Le Vassor in 1700 (BURNER, Hist. of the Reformation, ed. Pocock, iii. 305-7).

[Besides authorities cited, see Cal. State Papers, Dom. 1611-36, and Addenda, 1625-49, passim; Hist. MSS. Comm. 4th Rep. App. pp. 282, 301, 314, 6th Rep. App. pp. 278, 474, 679, 7th Rep. p. 260, 10th Rep. App. pp. 99-102, 623-616, 12th Rep. App. i. 440; Winwood's Memorials, iii. 278, 282, 420, 486; Birch's Negotiations, 1749; Cottonian MS. Galba E i. ff. 371, 375, 398, 405, 407, 409, 414; Nicholas Papers (Camden Soc.), vol. i. p. vi; Stafford Papers, i. 467; Devon's Issues, pp. 133, 208, 343; Welldon's Court of James I. p. 94; Court and Times of James I., ii. 177-8; Official Ret. Memb.

of Parl.; Granger's Biogr. Hist. i. 384; Le Neve's Pedigrees of Knights (Harl. Soc.), p. 391; Genealogist, vi. 100.] A. F. P.

TRUMBULL, SIR WILLIAM (1639-1716), secretary of state, was son and heir of William Trumbull (1594?-1668), who graduated B.A. from Magdalen College, Oxford, 19 Feb. 1624-5, and became student of the Middle Temple in 1625 and clerk to the signet. His mother was Elizabeth, only daughter of George Rodolph Weckerlin, Latin secretary to Charles I (RYN, England as seen by Foreigners, pp. cxxiii-xxxi); she died on 11 July 1652 in her thirty-third year. William Trumbull [q. v.] was his grandfather.

Trumbull was born at Easthampstead Park, and baptised on 11 Sept. 1639. He received his early instruction in Latin and French from his grandfather Weckerlin, and was sent in 1649 to Wokingham school. On 5 April 1655 he matriculated from St. John's College, Oxford, being entered as a gentleman-commoner under the Rev. Thomas Wyatt, and in 1657 was elected to a fellowship at All Souls' College, which he probably retained until his marriage in 1670. He graduated B.C.L. on 12 Oct. 1659, D.C.L. 10 July 1667, and he was entered at the Middle Temple as a student in 1657. After taking his degree he visited France and Italy, where he made the acquaintance of several distinguished persons, such as Lords Sunderland and Godolphin, Algernon Sidney and Compton (afterwards bishop of London). In 1664 and 1666 he travelled in company with Sir Christopher Wren and Edward Browne, eldest son of Sir Thomas Browne (BROWNE, Works, ed. Wilkin, vol. i. pp. lxxvii, 92, 97-110).

In 1660 Trumbull returned to college and entered upon active life in the profession of the law. During 1667, practising 'as a civilian in the vice-chancellor's court at Oxford, he appealed to the chancellor Clarendon and carried a point respecting the non-payment of fees for his doctor's degree, gained great credit by it and all the business of the court' (Gent. Mag. 1790, i. 4). He was admitted an advocate in the college of Doctors' Commons on 28 April 1668, and began practising in the ecclesiastical and admiralty courts. Several opportune changes among the advocates practising in his courts during 1672 brought him much business with an income of 500*l.* per annum. He was appointed to the chancellorship of the diocese of Rochester, and obtained the reversion, after the death of Sir Philip Warwick, of the post of clerk of the signet. Sir Philip died in 1682.

Trumbull went to Tangier under Lord

Dartmouth, and in the company of Pepys and others, in August 1683, with a promise that he should be at home again in six weeks. His appointment was as judge-advocate of the fleet and commissioner for settling the leases of the houses between the king and the inhabitants. Pepys at once makes a note: 'Strange to see how surprised and troubled Dr. Trumbull shows himself at this new work put on him of a judge-advocate, how he cons over the law-martial and what weak questions he asks me about it' (Life of Pepys, 1841, i. 325-6). The expedition set sail from St. Helen's on 19 Aug. 1683, and arrived in Tangier Bay on 14 Sept. Trumbull grumbled much over the business, and complained that 'he should have gotten ten guineas the first day of term.' Pepys calls him 'a man of the meanest mind as to courage that ever was born,' and on 20 Oct. adds, with perhaps an excess of disdain, 'So the fool went away, every creature of the house laughing at him' (ib. i. 326-423). On 10 Nov. 1683 Trumbull returned to Whitehall. The journal of the commissioners and their report on the valuation of the properties are among Lord Dartmouth's manuscripts (Hist. MSS. Comm. 11th Rep. App. v. 97, 99, 15th Rep. App. i. 34-9).

On the promotion of Godolphin in August 1684, the king thought for a time of Trumbull as his successor in the post of secretary of state (Corresp. of Clarendon and Rochester, 1828, i. 95). Shortly afterwards he refused the office of secretary of war in Ireland, and in the following November he was presented by Lord Rochester to the king and knighted (21 Nov. 1684). On 1 Feb. 1684-5 he was made clerk of deliveries of ordnance stores. By the king's command, and much against his own inclination, he was despatched in November 1685 as envoy extraordinary to France, and, as he could not retain his post of clerk of deliveries, he accepted in lieu of it a pension of 200*l.* per annum, 'the only pension he ever had.' Sir William was a zealous opponent of Roman catholicism, and did much to benefit the condition of the English protestants in France after the revocation of the edict of Nantes. This did not commend him either to the French or English court, and in August 1686 he received letters of recall. His services to the protestants were long held in remembrance. Bayle presented to him a copy of his dictionary, and received in return a Latin letter styling the work 'bibliothecam potius quam librum.' Several of Bayle's friends wished him to dedicate the work to Trumbull, and Pierre Sylvestre wrote that it was rare indeed to find such a Mæcenas. Mottenux dedicated to him his translation of St. Olon's 'Present State of Morocco' (1695), acknowledging his charity to many of the French refugees and his bounty to himself.

Through the favour of the Trelawny family, Trumbull sat from 1685 to 1687 for the Cornish borough of East Looe. In November 1686 he was made ambassador to the Porte, and embarked for Constantinople on 16 April 1687. An account of his receptions at Leghorn, Pisa, and Florence, is among the manuscripts of Mr. Cottrell Dormer (Hist. MSS. Comm. 2nd Rep. App. p. 83). He was a governor of the Hudson's Bay and the Turkey companies, and just before his departure for the East the latter body gave him 'a dinner at the Ship at Greenwich, and presented his lady with a gold cup' (ib. 7th Rep. App. p. 482). His mission at Constantinople, where he arrived on 17 Aug. 1687, having previously visited Smyrna and settled certain matters there, was attended by success, and at the desire of the Turkey merchants he was renominated (November 1689), and continued there until 31 July 1691. His narrative of events which occurred in Turkey to the close of April 1688 is contained in Addit. MS. 34799 (British Museum), and much of its substance was used by Sir Paul Rycaut [q. v.] in his history of the Turks, in continuation of Knolles (1700, pp. 187-290).

Trumbull was made a lord of the treasury on 3 May 1694 (ib. 14th Rep. App. ii. 550). Exactly a year later (3 May 1695) he was elevated to the position of secretary of state (in succession to Sir John Trenchard [q. v.]) and made a privy councillor; a few days afterwards he became secretary to the seven lords justices of England in the king's absence. At the general election in 1695 he was returned for the Yorkshire borough of Hedon and for the university of Oxford, when he chose the latter constituency, and sat for it until the dissolution in 1698. Trumbull, a man 'of moderate opinions and of temper cautious to timidity . . . hardly equal to the duties of his great place' (MACAULAY, Hist. of England, iv. 586, v. 20), after many attempts to withdraw, resigned the seals very suddenly on 1 Dec. 1697, complaining that the lords justices had treated him 'more like a footman than a secretary.' Lord Ailesbury speaks of him as less than a friend, 'nor was he to any but your obedient humble servant to all, like my Lord Plausible in the "Plain Dealer"' (Memoirs, Roxburghe Club, ii. 373-378). One piece of Trumbull's advice to William III deserves to be recorded: 'Do not send embassies to Italy, but a fleet into the Mediterranean.'

Trumbull withdrew from active life in 1698. He was offered in May 1702, but declined, to be one of the lord high admiral's council, and at a later date he excused himself 'upon the score of age and infirmities' from again accepting the seals (Hist. MSS. Comm. 12th Rep. App. iii. 35-6). Elm Grove, on the edge of Ealing Common, had formerly been his residence, but he now settled himself at Easthampstead.

Trumbull's name is associated with two great literary undertakings. Dryden records in the postscript to his translation of Virgil that 'if the last Æneid shine amongst its fellows, it is owing to the commands of Sir William Trumbull, who recommended it as his favourite to my care.' Pope made Trumbull's acquaintance about 1705. They 'used to take a ride out together three or four days a week and at last almost every day' (Spenser, Anecdotes, p. 194), and their talk was of the classics. Pope showed him his translation of the 'Epistle of Sarpedon from the 12th and 16th books of the Iliads,' and Trumbull, in his admiration, urged the young poet to translate the whole of Homer's works. The advice at last bore fruit.

Pope read his pastorals to the old statesman, and 'Spring' was dedicated to him. In the published work Trumbull is characterised as 'too wise for pride, too good for pow'r,' and as carrying into retirement 'all the world can boast. Trumbull had suggested 'Windsor Forest,' of which he was verderer, as a subject for Pope; had given him several hints and made some little alterations; but the credit was given by Pope to Granville, lord Lansdowne, and Trumbull complained of the 'slippery trick.' Lines 237 to 258, however, are in praise of the man who retired from court to glades like those of Windsor, the man 'whom Nature charms and whom the muse inspires,' and it ends with 'Thus Atticus, and Trumbull thus retired.' Pope evidently had a sincere liking for the old man. In his private memorandum of departed relatives and friends occurs his name with the words 'amicus meus humanissimus a juvenilibus annis' (see Pope, Works, ed. Elwin and Courthope, vi. 1-11, where are printed several communications that passed between Trumbull and the poet).

Trumbull died on 14 Dec. 1716, and on 21 Dec. was buried in Easthampstead church; a handsome monument was placed to his memory in the south transept. In 1670 he married his first wife, Katherine, daughter of Sir Charles Cotterell, master of the ceremonies, 'a very beautiful and accomplished woman,' whereupon his father settled upon him an income of 350*l.* a year; she died without issue on 8 July 1704. He married in Scotland, in October 1706, as his second wife, Judith (d. 1724), second daughter of Henry Alexander, fourth Earl of Stirling. They had two children, Judith (1707-1708) and William (1708-1760), from whose only daughter and heiress, the wife of Martyn, fourth son of the first Baron Sandys, are descended the present Marquis of Downshire and Lord Sandys. Elijah Fenton was the tutor of the young Trumbull from early in 1723-4, and died at Easthampstead in 1730. 'Lines by Sir Henry Sheers,' written to Sir William Trumbull's three nieces, are in 'Poems on several Occasions' appended to Prior's 'Poems' (1742, ii. 89-90).

Trumbull's character of Archbishop Dolben is printed in the 'History of Rochester' (2nd ed. 1817, pp. 160-2), and in the second edition of the 'Biographia Britannica' (v. 330-1). Many letters by him are in print or in manuscript, especially in the Record Office, the British Museum, and in the library at Easthampstead Park.

Jorvas was engaged to paint a family picture of the Trumbulls; it is probably the group now at Easthampstead. Sir William's portrait was also painted by Kneller, and a print of it by Vertue is dated 1724. Trumbull's bust, by Henry Cheere, is, with those of many other distinguished fellows of the college, in the library of All Souls'.

The politician's younger brother, Dr. CHARLES TRUMBULL (1646-1724), graduated B.A. from Christ Church, Oxford, in 1667, and D.O.L. from All Souls' in 1677. Two years later he became rector of Hadleigh in Suffolk, and rector of Stisted in Essex; was chaplain to Sancroft, and followed his example in resigning his benefices upon the Revolution. He died on 3 Jan. 1724 (Hist. Reg. Chron. Diary, p. 6).

[Foster's Alumni Oxon.; Le Neve's Knights (Harl. Soc. viii.), pp. 301-2; Ashmole's Visit. of Berks in Genealogist, vi. 100; Gent. Mag. 1790, i. 4-6; Pearson's Levant Chaplains, pp. 40, 42; Gyll's Wraybury, pp. 70-1; Burrows's All Souls' College, pp. 195, 380; Pigot's Hadleigh, pp. 189-200; Coote's Civilians, pp. 91-3; Wood's Insti., ed. Bliss, ii. 219, 299; Luttrell's Hist. Relation, i. 599, ii. 21, 33, 354-5, 599, iii. 101, 300, 459, 467-9, 610, v. 178-7, vi. 101; Shrewsbury Corresp. (1821), pp. 504-5; Vernon's Letters (1841), i. 432-3; Lloyd's Fenton and Friends, pp. 82-3; Gigas's Corresp. inédite de Bayls, pp. 491-505, 597-8; Pope, ed. Elwin and Courthope, i. pp. ix, 45, 233, 265-7, 324, iv. 382, v. 26-7, 122, 395, vi. pp. xxiv, l, viii. 4, 78, 157; information from Sir W. R. Anson, warden of All Souls' College, and Rev. Herbert Salway, rector of Easthampstead.]

W. P. G.

TRURO, BARON. [See WILDE, THOMAS, 172-1856.]

TRUSLER, JOHN (1735-1820), eccentric divine, literary compiler, and medical empiric, was born in London in July 1735. His father was the proprietor of the public tea-gardens at Marylebone. In his tenth year he was sent to Westminster school, and at the age of fifteen he was transferred to Mr. Fountaine's fashionable seminary at Marylebone. Next he proceeded to Emmanuel College, Cambridge, whence he graduated B.A. in 1757 (Graduati Cantabr. 1823, p. 479; Addit. MS. 5882, f. 97). On his return home he translated from the Italian several burlettas and adapted them to the English stage. One of these, he says, was 'La Serva Padrona,' or the 'Servant-Mistress,' of Giovanni Battista Pergolesi, performed in Marylebone Gardens in 1757; but it seems that the real translator was Stephen Storace [q. v.] (Baker, Biogr. Dramatica, 1812, iii. 269).

Trusler took holy orders, becoming a priest in 1759. He was curate successively of Enford, Wiltshire, of Ware, Hertfordshire, at Hertford, at the Hythe church, Colchester, at Oakley, Surrey, and of St. Clement-Danes at the Strand. In 1761 Dr. Bruce, the king's chaplain at Somerset House, employed him as his assistant and procured for him the chaplaincy to the Poultry-Compter. He also held a lectureship in the city. At this period he took a house at Rotherhithe.

But clerical work did not exhaust Trusler's energies. In 1762 he established an academy for teaching oratory 'mechanically,' but, as it did not pay, he soon gave it up. In order to acquire a knowledge of physic he admitted himself a perpetual pupil of Drs. Hunter and Fordyce. He then went to Leyden to take the degree of M.D., but his name does not appear in the catalogue of graduates in that university. However, he either obtained or assumed the title of doctor, and he is frequently styled LL.D. He superintended for some time the Literary Society established in 1766 with the object of abolishing publishers (Notes and Queries, 4th ser. iii. 421).

In 1769 he sent circulars to every parish in England and Ireland proposing to print in script type, in imitation of handwriting, about a hundred and fifty sermons at the price of one shilling each, in order to save the clergy both study and the trouble of transcribing. This ingenious scheme appears to have met with considerable success. Trusler next established a printing and bookselling business upon an extensive and a very lucrative scale. At one time he resided in Red Lion Street, Clerkenwell. He afterwards lived at Bath on the profits of his trade, and subsequently on an estate of his own at Englefield Green, Middlesex. In 1806 he published at Bath the first part of his autobiography, entitled 'The Memoirs of the Life of the Rev<sup>d</sup>. Dr. Trusler,' 4to. Only part i. appeared, and, it is said, the author sought to suppress it (Lowndes, Bibl. Manual, ed. Bohn, p. 2715). The remainder of the memoirs in Trusler's autograph were in 1851 in the possession of James Crossley of Manchester (Notes and Queries, 1st ser. iii. 110). Trusler died in 1820 at the Villa House, Bathwick. He married in 1769, his wife dying in December 1762. His portrait has been engraved.

Among his very numerous publications are: 1. 'The Difference between Words esteemed Synonyms, in the English Language; and the proper choice of them determined' (anon.), 2 vols., London, 1768, 12mo. A second edition, with the author's name, appeared in 1783; third edition, 2 vols., 1794; reprinted 1835. 2. 'Hogarth Moralized. Being a complete edition of Hogarth's Works. Containing near fourscore copperplates,' London, 1768, 8vo. This was published with the approval of the widow of the painter. There is a later edition, 2 vols., London, 1821, fol., with very inferior impressions of the plates. The edition prepared by John Major, London, 1831, 8vo, contains a new set of plates, beautifully engraved. To the edition in two vols., 1838, 4to, 'are added Anecdotes of the Author and his work by J. Hogarth and J. Nichols.' Trusler's explanations of the plates are likewise included in 'The Complete Works of Hogarth,' London, 1861-2, 4to. 3. 'Chronology: or, a concise view of the Annals of England,' London, 1769, 12mo; republished under the title of 'Chronology, or the Historian's Vade Mecum,' 4th edit., with great additions, London, 1772, 8vo; 14th edit., enlarged, 3 vols., 1792-1802. 4. 'Principles of Politeness,' being a compilation from Lord Chesterfield's Letters, 1775; 18th edit., [1790]; reprinted under the title of 'The New Chesterfield' [1836?]. 5. 'A descriptive Account of the Islands lately discovered in the South Seas. . . . With some Account of the Country of Camchatka,' London, 1778, 8vo. This is an abridgment of 'Cooke's Voyage.' 6. 'Practical Husbandry, or the Art of Farming, with certainty of gain,' London, 1780, 8vo; 5th edit., Bath, 1820, 8vo. 7. 'Luxury no Political Evil' [1780?]. 8. 'Poetic Endings, or a Dictionary of Rhymes, single and double,' London, 1783, 12mo. 9. 'A concise View of the Common and Statute Law of England,' 1784, being an abridgment of Blackstone's Commentaries. 10. 'The Sublime Reader, or the Morning & Evening Services of the Church so pointed . . . as to display all the Beauty and Sublimity of the Language,' 1784. 11. 'Compendium of Useful Knowledge,' 1784. 12. 'Modern Times, or the Adventures of Gabriel Outcast,' a satirical novel, in the manner of Gil Blas (anon.), 3 vols., 1785. 13. 'The London Adviser and Guide,' 1786 and 1790. 14. 'The Honour of the Table, or Rules for Behaviour during Meals; with the whole Art of Carving,' London, 1788, 12mo; 5th edit., Bath, 1795. 15. 'A Compendium of Useful Knowledge,' London, 1788, 12mo; 6th edit., Bath [1800?], 12mo. 16. 'The Habitable World described,' 20 vols. London, 1788-87, 8vo. 17. 'The Progress of Man and Society,' with woodcuts by J. Bewick, Bath [1790?], 12mo; London, 1791, 12mo. 18. 'Proverbs Exemplified, and illustrated by pictures from real life. . . . With prints by J. Bewick,' London, 1790, 12mo. 19. 'Life, or the Adventures of William Ramble, Esq.' (anon.), a novel, 3 vols., 1793. 20. 'Monthly Communications,' a periodical publication, 1793. 21. 'The Way to be Rich and Respectable,' 7th edit., London, 1796, 8vo. 22. 'A Compendium of Sacred History,' 1797, being a compilation from Stackhouse's History of the Bible. 23. 'A System of Etiquette,' Bath, 1804, 12mo; 3rd edit., London, 1828. 24. 'Detached Philosophic Thoughts of the best Writers, ancient and modern, on Man, Life, Death, and Immortality,' 2 vols., Bath, [1810], 8vo. 25. 'A Sure Way to lengthen Life with Vigor; particularly in Old Age; the result of Experience. Written by Dr. Truener at the age of 81,' 2 vols., Bath, 1819, 8vo. This is based on 'A Sure Way to lengthen Life,' which was printed in 1770 and passed through five editions.

[Autobiography; Annuaire Nécrologique, 1822, p. 339; Biogr. Dict. of Living Authors, 1816, pp. 355, 447; Critical Review, 1780, p. 442; Cromwell's Clerkenwell, p. 171; Pinks's Clerkenwell; Donaldson's Agricultural Biography, p. 66; Gent. Mag. 1778 p. 85, 1804 ii. 1106, 1820 ii. 89, 120, 1864 i. 114; London Chronicle, 18 Jan. 1770, advertisement; Lowndes's Bibl. Man. (Bohn); Marshall's Cat. of 600 celebrated Authors, 1788; New Monthly Mag. 1820, ii. 363; Nichols's Life of Hogarth; Notes and Queries, 3rd ser. iii. 133, 5th ser. iv. 316; Rivers's Lit. Memoirs of Living Authors, 1798, ii. 329; St. James's Chronicle, 26 Jan. 1769; Cat. of Dawson Turner's MSS. p. 287; Willis's Current Notes, 1853, p. 41.]

T. G.

TRUSSELL, JOHN (J. 1620-1642), historical writer, was the elder of the two sons of Henry Trussell by his wife, Sarah, whose maiden name is given variously as Kettlewood and Restwood (BERRY, Hants Genealogies, p. 143; Visit. Warwickshire, Harl. Soc. p. 98). The family came originally from Northamptonshire (BRIDGES, ii. 51), but the branch to which Trussell belonged had long been settled at Billesley, Warwickshire (DUGDALE, ii. 714-18; Harl. Soc. Publ. iv. 28, xii. 93, xiii. 359, xvii. 298, xvi. 223).

Henry Trussell's elder brother, THOMAS (J. 1610-1626) of Billesley, styled in the 'Visitation' the 'souldier,' was the last member of the family to own Billesley, which he sold before 1619 to Sir Robert Lee. In 1610 he wrote to Robert Cecil, earl of Salisbury, requesting his acceptance of 'a small labour composed by him and dedicated to his lordship, the object of which is to suggest means for supplying the king's private state' (Cal. State Papers, Dom. 1603-10, p. 612); he was afterwards employed as government messenger (ib. 1611-26 passim). He married Margaret, daughter of Edward Boughton of Causton. He was author of 'The Souldier pleading his own Cause . . . with an Epitome of the qualities required in the . . . officers of a private company. The second impression much enlarged with Military Instructions,' London, 1619, 8vo (Brit. Mus.); it contains some useful information on the military practices of the time.

John Trussell is said by Wood to have been a scholar of Winchester (but cf. KIMR). He settled down to business in that city, and took an active part in municipal politics. He became steward to the bishop of Winchester and alderman of the city, and served as mayor in 1624 and again in 1633 (Hist. and Antiq. of Winchester, 1773, ii. 289, 290; cf. Cal. State Papers, Dom. 1633-4, p. 377). But most of his time was devoted to historical research; in 1630 he published 'A Continuation of the Collection of the History of England, beginning where Samuel Daniel [q. v.] . . . ended, with the reigns of Edward the Third, and ending where . . . Viscount Saint Albones began . . . being a compleat history of the beginning and end of the dissension betwixt the two houses of York and Lancaster. With the Matches and issue of all the Kings, Princes, Dukes, Marquisses, Earles, and Viscounts of this Nation, deceased during those times,' London, fol. Trussell's book is a very creditable production, and is much superior to many works subsequently written on the period. In fulness and accuracy of information it is, at any rate, comparable with Bacon's 'Henry VII.' He does not quote his authorities, but professes to have 'examined, though not all, the most and best that have written of those times.' Differing from the chroniclers, he eschews 'matters of ceremony' like coronations, pageants, and 'superfluous exuberances,' such as 'great inundations, strange monsters,' and the like.

Trussell next devoted himself to the history of Winchester, and in 1642 he completed his 'Touchstone of Tradition, whereby the certainties of occurrences in this kingdom and elsewhere, before characters or letters were invented, is found out. . . . The work consists of five books, the second of which is dedicated to Walter Curll [q. v.], bishop of Winchester, and the fourth to Thomas Wrothesley, fourth earl of Southampton [q. v.]; it contains lists of the marquises, earls, bishops, mayors, and freemen of Winchester, besides accounts of local occurrences and antiquities. The manuscript, which passed through various hands, including those of Sir Thomas Phillipps (Wood, Athenæ, ii. 261, 270, iv. 222; Gough, Topography, i. 378, 387; Notes and Queries, 1st ser. vii. 616, 2nd ser. xi. 204), is now among Lord Mostyn's manuscripts (Hist. MSS. Comm. 4th Rep. App. p. 365). Bishop Nicolson guessed that it was too voluminous, and Kennett that it was too incomplete, to be published (Gough, Topography, i. 387); but it was largely used in 'A Description of Winchester,' 1750, 12mo, and in the 'History and Antiquities of Winchester,' 2 vols. 1773, 12mo (see vol. i. pp. vii, 219, ii. 164). Trussell also contributed, with Michael Drayton and others, to the 'Annalia Dubrensis,' 1686, 4to, edited by Captain Robert Dover [q. v.]. He married Elizabeth Collis, widow of Gratian Patten, and left issue three daughters (BERRY, Hants Genealogies, p. 143).

[Authorities cited; Works in Brit. Mus. Library.] A. F. P.

TRUSSELL or TRUSSEL, WILLIAM, sometimes styled BARON TRUSSELL (fl. 1380), was son of Edmund Trussell of Peatling in Leicestershire and Cuddlesdon in Staffordshire (Cal. Rot. Chart. Reo. Comm. p. 166). He was pardoned as one of the adherents of Thomas of Lancaster on 1 Nov. 1318, and was returned as knight of the shire for Northampton in 1319. Both he and his son were in arms with Thomas of Lancaster against the king at Boroughbridge in March 1322. He is said to have fled beyond seas after Lancaster's overthrow (French Chronicle of London, Camden Soc. p. 44), but he was still in Somerset with some outlaws like himself in August 1322. He escaped abroad, however, not to return until 24 Sept. 1320, when he landed with Isabella at Harwich. On 27 Oct. 1326 the elder Hugh le Despenser

[q. v.] was tried before him at Winchester, Trussell being described as 'justiciarius ad hoc deputatus,' and sentenced by him to be hanged, the younger Despenser suffering a like fate on 24 Nov. 1326. Trussell delivered judgment in a long speech full of accusations of a very unjudicial character (Annales Paulini, i. 814, 817; Gesta Edwardi II, pp. 87-9).

On Monday, 26 Jan. 1327, Trussell, acting as procurator of the whole parliament, solemnly renounced allegiance to Edward II at Berkeley. On 12 Feb. he received a commission of oyer and terminer, but on 28 Feb. was named as one of the envoys sent to the pope by King Edward to obtain the canonisation of Thomas of Lancaster (RYMER, ii. 695). Despite his absence, he seems to have held the office of escheator (Cal. Pat. Rolls, p. 27), but he probably returned to England by 18 Aug. He was appointed to another mission in March 1328 (ib. p. 250), and also in May 1330 to negotiate an alliance with the kings of Aragon, Portugal, Majorca, and Castile, but it seems likely that his departure was delayed till late in September. Part of his mission was to negotiate a marriage between Peter, the eldest son of the king of Aragon, and the king's sister Eleanor. He still continued to act occasionally as justice, but on 28 June 1331 a commission of oyer and terminer to him had to be confided to Richard de Wylughby, as he was too much occupied with other business of the king to act (ib. p. 138). On 25 June he received a hundred marks for his expenses while thus engaged (ib. p. 150). On 15 July 1331 he received power with John Darcy to treat for a marriage between Edward, the king's son, and the daughter of the king of France. On 18 Oct. Edward granted him the lordship of Bergues in Flanders for his services. In February 1332 he and his son William were sent on the king's service to the king of France and the court of Rome, receiving 60*l.* from the Bardi for the expenses (Pat. Rolls, pp. 233, 255). On 24 Feb. 1333 he and three others received power to treat with Ralph, count of Eu, for a marriage between his daughter Joan and John, earl of Cornwall (ib. p. 413), and on 26 March 1334 he and others received power to renew the negotiations commenced at Montreuil, Agen, and elsewhere (RYMER, ii. 881). On 16 July 1334 he was appointed to arrange a marriage with the daughter of the lord of Lara for John of Cornwall (Cal. Pat. Rolls, p. 564), and on 2 Aug. to receive the homage of the Count of Savoy (RYMER, ii. 891). On 28 March 1335 the king appointed him to carry out his orders to prevent the members of the university of Oxford retiring for study to Stamford (ib. p. 903). On 6 July 1330 he was appointed one of an embassy to treat with Philip of France for a joint expedition to the Holy Land, and to arrange an interview between the two kings of France (ib. p. 941). On 13 April 1337 he went with five others to treat with the Count of Flandere and the cities of Bruges, Ghent, and Ypres. He was one of the envoys appointed to treat for peace with France on 13 April 1343, May 1343 at Rome, and to treat with Flanders in July of the same year; in February 1345 for a marriage of one of the king's daughters with the son of the king of Castile; and in the same year one of the counsellors of the king's son Lionel (ib. iii. 50). He was summoned to a council which was not a regular parliament on 25 Feb. 1341-2, and he is not therefore reckoned a peer (G. E. O[OKAYNN], Complete Peerage, vi. 432); neither his son nor any of his descendants was ever summoned to parliament. It is quite uncertain whether it was he or his son who was one of those appointed to try the earls of Montoith and Fife, who were taken in the battle of Neville's Cross, for rebellion. The date of his death is also uncertain. Stow (Survey, ed. Strype, bk. vi. p. 21) mentions the monument of 'Sir William Trussell, kt., speaker to the House of Commons at the deposing of King Edward the Second,' in St. Michael's Chapel, Westminster Abbey. Dean Stanley (Memorials, p. 178 n.) says he died in 1364, but inconsistently identifies him with William Trussell who was speaker in 1366 (Rot. Parl. 1369). He founded in 1337 at Shoteshbrooke in Berkshire a college for a warden and five priests (DUGDALE, Monasticon, vi. 1447).

The elder Trussell had a son William whose biography is difficult to disentangle from that of his father. It must have been the son who had to flee the country while Roger Mortimer remained in power (1327-1330), as the father acted as ambassador, and seems to have retained his office after the failure of Henry of Lancaster's movement of insurrection at the end of 1328 and the fall of Mortimer in October 1330. It is also probable that it was the son who was admiral of the fleet west and north of the Thames in 1339 and 1343.

[The chronicles collected in Stubbs's Chronicles of the Reigns of Edward I and Edward II, and Murimuth, Knighton, and Robert of Reading (Flores Historiarum, iii.), afford many indications, but the most important sources are the Rolls of Parliament, Parliamentary Writs, Rymer's Foedera, and the Cal. of the Charter Rolls (Record Comm.), and the Calendars of the Close Rolls, 1307-23, 1327-30, and Patent Rolls, 1327-34, published by order of the master of the rolls; Cal. Inq. post mortem, ii. 262; Dugdale's Baronage of England, ii. 141, 142, and Foss's Judges of England.]

W. E. R.

TRYE, CHARLES BRANDON (1767-1811), surgeon, descended from the ancient family of Trye of Hardwicke in Gloucestershire, was elder son of John Trye, rector of Leckhampton, near Cheltenham, by his wife Mary, daughter of the Rev. John Longford of Harosfield, near Stroud. He was born on 21 Aug. 1767, and his parents died while he was at the grammar school in Cirencester. He was apprenticed in March 1778 to Thomas Hallward, an apothecary in Worcester, and in 1778 he became a pupil of William Russell, then senior surgeon to the Worcester Infirmary. At the expiration of his indentures in January 1780 he came to London to study under John Hunter (1728-1793, [q. v.], and was appointed house apothecary or house surgeon to the Westminster Hospital, acting more particularly under the influence of Henry Watson, the surgeon and professor of anatomy at the Royal Academy. He acted as house surgeon for nearly eighteen months, and his skill as a dissector appears to have attracted the notice of John Sheldon [q. v.], who engaged him to assist in the labours of his private anatomical school in Great Queen Street. Sheldon's illness and his enforced retirement from London led to the connection being severed, and Trye returned to Gloucester, where he was appointed house apothecary to the infirmary on 27 Jan. 1783, and shortly after quitting this post he was elected in July 1784 surgeon to the charity, a position he filled until 1810. He was admitted a member of the Corporation of Surgeons on 4 March 1784. In 1793 he established, in conjunction with the Rev. Thomas Stock, a lying-in charity in Gloucester, which, after being carried on by them for seven years almost entirely at their own expense, has since been supported by the public. In 1797 he succeeded under the will of his cousin, Henry Norwood, to a considerable estate in the parish of Leckhampton, near Cheltenham, but he still continued to practise his profession, for he devoted his rents to the payment of his cousin's debts. He opened up the stone quarries at Leckhampton Hill, and constructed a branch tramway, opened on 10 July 1810, to bring the stone from the quarries to within reach of the Severn at Gloucester. He was admitted a fellow of the Royal Society on 17 Dec. 1807, and at the time of his death he was a member of the Royal Medical Society of Edinburgh.

Trye was a man of considerable local importance. As a surgeon he acquired unusual skill in performing some of the most difficult operations. He was the steady friend and promoter of vaccination, and Jenner had a high opinion of his abilities.

He died on 7 Oct. 1811, and was buried in the churchyard of St. Mary de Crypt at Gloucester. A plain tablet, with an inscription prepared by himself, was put up in the church at Leckhampton, while a public memorial to perpetuate his memory was placed in Gloucester Cathedral. He married, in May 1792, Mary (d. 1848), the elder daughter of Samuel Lysons, rector of Rodmarton, near Cirencester (and sister of the author of the 'Enviros'), by whom he had ten children, and of these three sons and five daughters survived him.

Trye published: 1. 'Remarks on Morbid Retentions of the Urine,' Gloucester, 1774, 8to; another edition, 1784. 2. 'Review of Jesse Foote's Observations on the Opinions of John Hunter on the Venereal Disease,' London, 1787, 8vo. This is the work by which Trye is now best known. It is a spirited defence of his old master against the scurrilous attacks of his enemy. 3. 'An Essay on the Swelling of the Lower Extremities incident to Lying-in Women,' London, 1792, 8vo. 4. 'Illustrations of some of the Injuries to which the Lower Limbs are exposed,' London, 1802, 4to. 5. 'Essay on some of the Stages of the Operation of cutting for Stone,' London, 1811, 8vo.

There is a medallion-bust of Trye by Charles Rossi, R.A., in the west end of the north aisle of Gloucester Cathedral. It was engraved by J. Nagle from a drawing by Richard Smirke.

[A Sketch of the Life and Character of the late O. B. Trye, by D. Lysons of Rodmarton, privately printed, 4to, Gloucester, reprinted with additions at Oxford, 1848, 32mo; Med. and Phys. Journal, 1811, xxvi. 608. Fosbrooke's Gloucester, 1810, p. 149; Gent. Mag. 1811, ii. 487; valuable information kindly obtained by Mr. H. Y. J. Taylor of Gloucester, Dr. Oscar Clarke, physician to the Gloucester Infirmary, and from the late James B. Bailey, librarian to the Royal College of Surgeons of England.] D'A. P.

TRYON, SIR GEORGE (1832-1893), vice-admiral, third son of Thomas Tryon (d. 1872) of Bulwick Park, Northamptonshire, by his wife Anne (d. 1877), daughter of Sir John Trollope, sixth baronet, was born on 4 Jan. 1832. The Tryons are believed to have been of Dutch origin, but have been seated at Bulwick since the reign of James I. After a few years at Eton he entered the navy in the spring of 1848, as a naval cadet of the Wellesley, then fitting for the flag of Lord Dundonald as commander-in-chief of the North American station. He was somewhat older than was usual, and a good deal bigger. When he passed for midshipman he was over eighteen, and was more than six feet. His size helped to give him authority, and his age gave him steadiness and application; zeal and force of character were natural gifts, and when the Wellesley paid off in June 1851 he had won the very high opinion of his commanding officer. A few weeks later he was appointed to the Vengeance, with Captain Lord Edward Russell [q. v.], for the Mediterranean station, where he still was at the outbreak of the Russian war. On 15 March 1854 he passed his examination in seamanship, but continuing in the Vengeance, from her maintop watched the battle of the Alma, in which his two elder brothers were engaged. Shortly after the battle of Inkerman he was landed for service with the naval brigade, and a few days later was made a lieutenant into a death vacancy of 21 Oct., the admiral writing to him, 'You owe it to the conduct and character which you bear in the service.' In January 1855 Tryon was re-embarked and returned to England in the Vengeance; but when he had passed his examination at Portsmouth, he was again sent out to the Black Sea as a lieutenant of the Royal Albert—flagship of Sir Edmund (afterwards Lord) Lyons [q. v.], whose captain, William Mends, had been the commander of the Vengeance. The Royal Albert returned to Spithead in the summer of 1858, formed part of the queen's escort to Cherbourg in July, and was paid off in August. In November Tryon was appointed to the royal yacht, from which he was promoted to be commander on 25 Oct. 1860.

In June 1861 he was selected to be the commander of the Warrior, the first British seagoing ironclad, then preparing for her first commission, considered to be somewhat of the nature of a grand and costly experiment. Tryon remained in her, attached to the Channel fleet, till July 1864, when he was appointed to an independent command in the Mediterranean, the Surprise gun-vessel, which he brought home and paid off in April 1866. He was then (11 April) promoted to the rank of captain. During the next year he went through a course of theoretical study at the Royal Naval College at Portsmouth, and in August 1867 was away fishing in Norway, when he was recalled to go out as director of transports in Annesley Bay, where the troops and stores were landed for the Abyssinian expedition. The work, neither interesting nor exciting, was extremely hard in a sweltering and unhealthy climate. His talent for organisation, his foresight and clearheadedness, his care and his intimate knowledge of details strongly impressed all the officers, naval and military, with whom he came in contact, and won the esteem and regard of the masters of the transports—men not always the most amenable to discipline—who after his return to England presented him with a handsome service of plate in commemoration of their gratitude for his influence and management, his justice and general kindness, his perseverance and forbearance, to which they considered the success of this work largely due. His health, however, was severely tried, and for some months after his return to England he was very much of an invalid. On 5 April 1869 he married Clementina, daughter of Gilbert John Heathcote, first lord Aveland, and went for a tour in Italy and Central Europe, settling down in the autumn near Doncaster.

In April 1871 he was appointed private secretary to Mr. Goschen, then first lord of the admiralty; and, though his want of time and services as a captain might easily have caused some jealousy or friction, his good-humoured tact and ready wit overcame all difficulties, and won for him the confidence of the navy as well as of Mr. Goschen. In January 1874 he was appointed to the Raleigh, again an experimental ship, and commanded her for upwards of three years in the flying squadron, in attendance on the Prince of Wales during his tour in India, and in the Mediterranean. In June 1877 he was appointed one of a committee for the revision of the signal-book and the manual of fleet evolutions, and in October 1878 took command of the Monarch, again in the Mediterranean, one of the fleet with Sir Geoffrey Hornby in the sea of Marmora, and in the autumn of 1880 with Sir Frederick Beauchamp Paget Seymour (afterwards Lord Alcester) [q. v.] in the international demonstration against the Turks in the Adriatic. During the summer and autumn of 1881 Tryon was specially employed as senior officer on the coast of Tunis, and by his 'sound judgment and discretion' gained the approval of the foreign secretary and the lords of the admiralty. In January 1882 the Monarch was paid off at Malta, and shortly after his return to England Tryon was appointed secretary of the admiralty, which office he held till April 1884, and was in this autumn of 1882 largely concerned in the establishment of the department of naval intelligences.

On 1 April 1884 he was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral, and in December left England to take the command-in-chief of the Australian station, where, during the war 'scare' of 1885 and afterwards, he distinctly formulated the scheme of colonial defence which has been subsequently carried into effect. In June 1887 he returned to England; on the 21st he was nominated a K.C.B. (one of the jubilee promotions); and after a few months' holiday, including a season's shooting, he was appointed in April 1888 to the post of superintendent of reserves, which carried with it also the duty of commanding one of the opposing fleets in the mimic war of the summer manoeuvres. This Tryon performed for three years, bringing into the contest a degree of vigour which, especially in 1889, went far to solve some of the strategic questions then discussed in naval circles (Edinburgh Review, January 1890, pp. 154-62). He also at this time wrote an article on 'National Insurance' (United Service Magazine, May 1890), in which he put forward a scheme for the protection of commerce, and especially of the supply of food in times of war. This scheme was not favourably received by shipowners and merchants, and, indeed, Tryon's principal object was probably rather to lift the discussion out of this academic or abstract groove into which it had got, and to force people to consider the question as one of the gravest practical importances.

On 15 Aug. 1889 he became a vice-admiral, and in August 1891 he was appointed to the command of the Mediterranean station, where, as often as circumstances permitted, he collected the fleet for his practice of evolutions on a grand scale. About his methods much was afterwards said, and especially about one—manœuvring without signals—which has been freely denounced as most dangerous, and, in fact, suicidal. But Tryon conceived it to be the best and most fitting training for the manœuvres of battle. It was, too, repeatedly practised by the fleet without any untoward incident, and it had nothing to do with the dreadful accident which closed Tryon's career. The manœuvres which resulted in that calamity was ordered deliberately, by signal.

On the morning of 22 June 1893 the fleet weighed from Beyrout, and a little after 2 P.M. was off Tripoli, where it was intended to anchor. The ships were formed in two columns twelve hundred yards apart; and about half-past three the signal was made to invert the course in succession, turning inwards, the leading ships first. The two leading ships were the Victoria, carrying Tryon's flag, and the Camperdown, carrying the flag of the second in command, Rear-admiral Markham. It was clear to every one in the fleet, except to Tryon himself, that the distance between the columns was too small to permit the ships to turn together in the manner prescribed, and by some, at least, of the captains, it was supposed that Tryon's intention was for the Victoria and the ships astern of her to turn on a large circle, so as to pass outside the Camperdown and the ships of the second division. That this was not so was only realised when it was seen that the two ships, turning at the same time, both inwards, must necessarily come in collision. They did so. It was a question of but two or three seconds as to which should give, which should receive the blow. The Victoria happened to be by this short time ahead of the Camperdown; she received the blow on her starboard bow, which was cut open; as her bows were immersed her stern was cocked up, she turned completely over and plunged head first to the bottom. The boats of the other ships were immediately sent to render what assistance they could, but the loss of life was very great. Tryon went down with the ship, and was never seen again. The most probable explanation of the disaster seems to be a simple miscalculation on the part of the admiral, a momentary forgetfulness that two ships turning inwards needed twice the space that one did. As the two ships were approaching each other and the collision was seen to be inevitable, Tryon was heard to say 'It is entirely my fault.'

A portrait, after a drawing by C. W. Walton, is prefixed to the 'Life' by Admiral Fitzgerald (1897), while at p. 72 is a reproduction of a miniature painted by Easton in 1857.

(Tryon's life, both public and private, is fairly and sympathetically described in the Life by Rear-admiral C. C. Penrose-Fitzgerald, London, 1897, 8vo. A more detailed narrative of the loss of the Victoria is in the Blue-book, containing the minutes of the court-martial; cf. Brassey's Naval Annual, 1894 (art. by Mr. J. R. Thrusfield). See also the article by Vice-Admiral Colomb in the Saturday Review, 27 Feb. 1897.]
J. K. L.

TRYON, THOMAS (1634-1703), 'Pythagorean,' the son of William Tryon, a tiler, and his wife Rebecca, was born at Bibury, near Cirencester, on 6 Sept. 1634. He was sent to the village school, but had barely learned to read when he was put by his father to spinning and carding, at which industry he worked from 1648 to 1649, earning two shillings a week and upwards. But his predilection was for the life of a shepherd, and he tended a small flock for his father from his eleventh to his eighteenth year, when he 'grew weary of shepherdizing, and had an earnest desire to travel.' Having relearned his letters and saved three pounds, he trudged to London, and, with his father's approval, bound himself apprentice to 'a castor-maker' (i.e. hatter) in Bridewell Dock, Fleet Street. He followed his master's example in becoming an anabaptist, and worked overtime to provide himself with books for astrological and medical study. About 1657, as a result of a perusal of the mystical works of Behmen, he underwent a phase of spiritual revolt and broke with the anabaptists. 'The blessed day-star of the Lord began to arise and shine in my heart and soul, and the Voice of Wisdom . . . called upon me for separation and self-denial . . . retrenching vanities and flying all intemperance. . . . I betook myself to water only for drink, and forebore eating any kind of flesh or fish, confining myself to an abstemious self-denying life. My drink was only water, and food only bread and some fruit. But afterwards I had more liberty given me by my guide, Wisdom, viz. to eat butter and cheese. My clothing was mean and thin, for in all things self-denial was now become my real business' (Some Memoirs, p. 27). This strict life he maintained for more than a twelvemonth, relapsing, however, at intervals during the next two years, the natural result of such an ascetic life; but at the end of this period he had become confirmed in his reform, and he practised it strictly until death. In 1661 he married 'a sober young woman,' Susanna, whom he did not succeed in converting to his own 'innocent way of living.' After his marriage he visited Barbados, where he extended his trade in 'beavers,' and on his return, his business in the city continuing to prosper, he settled down with a young family at Hackney. There, in his forty-eighth year, he became conscious of an inward instigation to write and publish his convictions to the world. His writings are a curious medley of mystical philosophy and dietetics, his objects being, as he himself informs us, to 'recommend to the world temperance, cleanness, and innocency of living . . . to give his readers Wisdom's bill of fare . . . and at the same time to write down several mysteries concerning God and his government' (ib. p. 55). He strongly recommends a vegetable diet, together with abstinence from tobacco, alcohol, and indeed all luxuries; but recognising that, in spite of his admonitions, people would still imbibe strong drinks and

'gorge themselves on the flesh of their fellow animals,' he gives some practical information on the subject of meats, and wrote a little treatise on the proper method of brewing (No. 9, below). In his horror of war and his advocacy of silent meditation, as well as in his mystical belief, he forms an interesting link between the Behmenists and the early quakers; and he seems to have been widely read by sectaries of various schools both in England and America. Benjamin Franklin was greatly impressed when a youth by the perusal of 'The Way to Health,' and became for the time being a 'Tryonist'; nor is it in any degree fanciful to discover a marked likeness between the style of Franklin and the quaint moralising of Tryon, though there is in the latter a vein of mystical piety to which 'Poor Richard,' with all his virtues, is a stranger. Many of Tryon's positions were repeated in 1802 by Joseph Ritson in his 'Essay on Abstinence from Animal Food,' and some opinions are quoted from 'Old Tryon' (p. 80), though Ritson seems to have owed his inspiration more directly to Rousseau. Views somewhat similar to those of Tryon, but in a more refined form, were held by Lewis Gompertz [q. v.], the founder of the 'Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals,' who was in 1832 denounced by an ultra-orthodox follower as a 'Pythagorean.'

Tryon died at Hackney on 21 Aug. 1703, leaving house property to his surviving daughters—Rebecca, married to John Owen; and Elizabeth, married to Richard Wilkinson. It was believed that he had prepared a complete autobiography, but his executors were able to discover among his papers merely a fragment, or perhaps a rough draft only, of the early portion, and this was published by T. Sowle, the well-known quaker bookseller, in 1705, as 'Some Memoirs of the Life of Mr. Tho. Tryon, late of London, Merchant,' London, 12mo. Appended to the volume is a list of rules for Tryon's followers; but it is at least doubtful whether a society was ever organised in obedience to this paper constitution. Prefixed to some copies is an engraved portrait by R. White, from the block which had already supplied the frontispiece to some of his works. It depicts a man of severe aspect, with a square-shaped and very massive head. The portrait was re-engraved for Caulfield's 'Portraits of Remarkable Persons.' The British Museum copy of the rare 'Memoirs' is unfortunately mutilated.

Tryon's chief works were: 1. 'A Treatise on Cleanness in Meats and Drinks, of the Preparation of Food . . . and the Benefits of

Clean Sweet Beds; also of the Generation of Bugs and their Cure. . . to which is added a short Discourse of Pain in the Teeth,' London, 1682, 4to (Brit. Mus.) 2. 'The Good Housewife made a Doctor; or Health's Choice and Sure Friend,' London, 1682 (Watt), 1692, 12mo (Brit. Mus.) 3. 'Health's Grand Preservative; or the Women's Best Doctor . . . shewing the Ill-Consequences of drinking Distilled Spirits and smoking Tobacco . . . with a Rational Discourse on the excellency of Herbs,' London, 1682, 4to (Brit. Mus.) The work commonly referred to as the 'Way to Health,' 1691, 8vo, is a second edition of this manual; 3rd edit. 1697. Mrs. Aphra Behn addressed lines to Tryon as the author of this work. 4. 'A Dialogue between an East Indian Brackmann . . . and a French Gentleman . . . concerning the present Affairs of Europe,' 1688, 8vo; 2nd ed. 1691 (see HALKETT and LAING). 5. 'A Treatise of Dreams and Visions,' 2nd ed. London [1689], 8vo; another edition, entitled 'Pythagoras his Mystick Philosophy reviv'd, or the Mystery of Dreams unfolded,' London, 1691, 8vo (Brit. Mus.) 6. 'Friendly Advice to Gentlemen Planters of East and West Indies,' London, 1684, 8vo (Bodleian; LOWNDERS). This is an enlightened plea for the more humane treatment of negro slaves. 7. 'The Way to make all People Rich; or Wisdom's Call to Temperance and Frugality,' London [1685], 12mo (HALKETT and LAING; DOUCE, Catalogue, p. 279). 8. 'Monthly Observations for Preservation of Health, by Philotheos Physiologus,' London, 1688, 8vo (Bodleian). 9. 'New Art of Brewing Beer, Ale, and other Sorts of Liquors,' 2nd edit. 1691, 12mo (GORDON); 3rd edit. 1691 (Brit. Mus.) 10. 'Wisdom's Dictates; or Aphorisms and Rules, Physical, Moral, and Divine . . . to which is added a Bill of Fare of Seventy-five Noble Dishes of excellent Food,' London, 1691, 12mo; 2nd edit. 1696, 12mo (Brit. Mus. with manuscript notes). 11. 'A New Method of educating Children; or Rules and Directions for the well ordering and governing them,' London, 1695, 12mo (Brit. Mus.) 12. 'Miscellanea; or a Collection of Tracts on Variety of Subjects [chiefly medical],' London, 1696, 12mo (Brit. Mus.) 13. 'The Way to save Wealth, shewing how a Man may live plentifully for Two-pence a Day,' London, 1697, 12mo (Brit. Mus. imperf.) 14. 'England's Grandeur and Way to get Wealth; or Promotion of Trade made easy and Lands advanced,' London, 1699, 4to (Brit. Mus.) 15. 'Tryon's Letters, Domestick and Foreign, to several Persons of Quality occasionally distributed in Subjects,' London, 1700, 8vo (Brit. Mus.) 16. 'The Knowledge of a Man's Self the surest Guide to the True Worship of God and Good Government of the Mind and Body . . . or the Second Part of the Way to Long Life, Health and Happiness,' London, 1768, 8vo, to which was appended in the following year a third part, London, 8vo (Brit. Mus.)

[Tryon's Works in the British Museum; 'A Year of the Seventeenth Century,' a Paper read before the Liverpool Literary and Philosophical Society on 8 April 1871 by the Rev. Alexander Gordon; Williams's Ethics of Diet, 1896, pp. 242-8; The Post Boy robbed of his Mail, 1692, vol. ii., Letter lxvi.; Monthly Repository, ix. 170; Franklin's Autobiography, ed. Bigelow, Philadelphia, 1868; Caulfield's Portraits of Remarkable Persons, 1819, i. 54-6; Noble's Continuation of Granger's Biogr. Hist. i. 276-8; Halkett and Laing's Diet. of Anon. and Pseudon. Lit. pp. 970, 1654, 2795; Hazlitt's Collections and Notes, 1876; Springer's Wegweiser in der vegetariarischen Literatur, Nordhausen, 1800, p. 54; Graham's Science of Human Life, 1864, p. 528.] T. S.

TRYON, WILLIAM (1725-1788), governor of New York, a descendant of Abraham Tryon of Bulwick, Northamptonshire, of a family which had migrated to England in consequence of Alva's cruelties in the Low Countries, was born in 1725. He obtained a commission as captain of the first regiment of footguards in 1751, and in 1758 became lieutenant-colonel. Shortly afterwards he married a lady named Wake, who had a large fortune and was related to Wills Hill, second viscount Hillsborough [q. v.], who was in September 1763 appointed first commissioner of trade and plantations. Through Hillsborough's influence Tryon was appointed lieutenant-governor of North Carolina, where he arrived to take up his office on 27 June 1764, and, on the death of Governor Arthur Dobbs on 20 July 1765, he was appointed governor with an allowance of £1,000 a year from the British treasury (Addit. MS. 33056, f. 202). A firm administrator, he led in person a force against some formidable rioters in the province, who called themselves 'regulators,' and summarily crushed the insurrection (1770). By a policy of blandishment in which he was aided by his wife, he extracted a large sum from the assembly towards the erection of a governor's house (Tryon's Carolina Letter-book, 1764-71, was bought for Harvard College in 1845). In July 1771 Tryon effected an exchange with the Earl of Dunmore, and became governor of New York, whither he arrived in the sloop Sukey on 8 July. He brought with him the reputation of a vigorous and able administrator, and was received with feasts and addresses. In his opening message to the provincial assembly he urged the claims of the New York hospital and the formation of an efficient force of militia. In December 1772 he was able to report to Dartmouth 'the most brilliant militia review ever held within his majesty's American dominions.'

He identified himself with the colony by speculating largely in land, and during the August of 1772 paid a visit to the Indian country. A new district, named Tryon County, was settled west of the Schenectady. In April 1773 he wrote to Lord Hyde, requesting 'some solid reward for his services' in North Carolina and elsewhere. On 29 Dec. 1773 the New York government house in Fort George accidentally caught fire and was consumed in two hours. The governor and his lady escaped on to the ramparts, but Miss Tryon nearly perished in the flames. Five thousand pounds was voted to the governor for his losses. In the following April Tryon sailed on a visit to England in the Mercury packet, receiving upon his departure addresses of regret and esteem from all the corporate bodies in the city. He had made a large grant of land to King's College, which conferred upon him the honorary degree of LL.B. While in England he strongly recommended to Dartmouth a conciliatory attitude (Dartmouth Papers, ii. 292).

Tryon was ordered back to his post in May 1775; he sailed on board the Johanna from Spithead on 9 May, and arrived at New York on 25 June 1775. The colonists were already in a state of rebellion, and Washington had passed through the city to take up his post as commander of the American forces on the very morning of the governor's return. Hostile shots were exchanged in New York Harbour in August 1775, and on 19 Oct. Tryon (who had already written to ask discretionary leave to return home) thought it wise to seek refuge on the sloop Halifax; he removed thence to the 'Dutchess of Gordon, ship,' in which he remained now in the North River, and now off Sandy Hook, for nearly a year, sending a number of important despatches to the government, but impotent to control the course of events. He re-entered New York in September 1776 upon Howe's making himself master of that city. He was warmly welcomed by the loyalists in the city, and in April 1777 took command of a corps of provincial loyalists. Early in 1778 he asked permission to resign his governorship for a military employment, and by a despatch from Lord George Germain (dated Whitehall, 5 June 1778) he was appointed to the command of the 70th (or Surrey) regiment, and at the same time promoted major-general 'in America.' James Robertson (1720 P-1788) succeeded him as civil governor of New York, this being the last British appointment to that post. Tryon's lands were forfeited, and he was attainted by an act of congress dated 22 Oct. 1779. In the meantime he had been urging by every means in his power a more vigorous conduct of the war, and called upon the government to undertake a system of 'depredatory excursions.' He succeeded in obtaining power to issue letters of marque, and claimed that his privateers had greatly damaged the enemy; he further recommended that a reward should be offered for the capture of members of congress. In the summer of 1779 he made a successful expedition into Connecticut, and during the succeeding winter Sir Henry Clinton left him in command of the troop in the New York district. Early in 1780, however, a 'very severe gout' compelled his return to England, and his health precluded him from taking further service in America. He was promoted lieutenant-general on 20 Nov. 1782, and died at his house in Upper Grosvenor Street on 27 Dec. 1788. He was buried at Twickenham. No portrait of Tryon is believed to be extant. His autograph and coat of arms are facsimiled in Wilson's 'Memorial History of the City of New York.'

[Tryon's correspondence with Lord George Germain occupies a large part of vol. viii. of the 'Documents relating to the Colonial History of New York State,' 1857, 4to, which forms the chief authority. Next in importance are the Dartmouth Papers, Hist. MSS. Comm., 14th Rep., App. x. frag.; other fragments of Tryon's official correspondence are in Add. MSS. 21673 and 21735 passim; see also Sabine's Loyalists of the American Revolution, 1864, ii. 364-6; Grant Wilson's Memorial Hist. of New York, 1892, vol. ii. chap. viii.; Roberts's Planting and Growth of Empire State, 1887; Locky's Hist. of England, iii. 414, iv. 116; Win-or's List. of America, vol. vi.; Williamson's North Carolina, Philad. 1812, ii. 113-43; Records of North Carolina, 1890, vol. vii.; Northamptonshire Notes and Queries, 1891, p. 236; Gent. Mag. 1788, i. 179.] T. S.

TUATHAL (d. 514), king of Ireland, called Maelgarbh, Roughcrown, to distinguish him from Tuathal Teachtmar, to whom the Irish historians attribute the subjugation of the Aithech Tuatha and restoration of the Milesian line in A.D. 76, was son of Cormac the blind, son of Cairbre, son of Niall Naighiallach [q. v.], and was therefore second cousin of Muircheartach Mor [q. v.], whom he succeeded in 533 as king of Ireland. His power was resisted by the Cianachta, a tribe in the east of Meath and Louth, but he defeated them at the battle of Cluanailbhe in Meath. They had probably supported Dermot's claim to be ardrigh; Dermot was son of Cearbhall, son of Conall Cremthain, son of Niall Naighiallach, and, after the defeat of the Cianachta, he was obliged to live as a fugitive, and as such took part in the foundation of Clonmacnoise [see below]. Annals of the Four Masters reward Dermot's foster brother Maelmordha rode into Tuathal's presence with an animal's heart on a spear, as if to claim the reward, and when close to the king stabbed him with the spear and was himself slain. This assassination is said to have taken place in 544 at a spot called Greallach, but which of the several localities called by this Irish equivalent of Slough is not clear in the chronicles. Dermot succeeded Tuathal as king of Ireland.

[O'Donovan's Annals Rioghachta Eireann, i. 181, Dublin, 1851; Donnelly's Annals of Ulster (Rolls Ser.), i. 48.] N. M.

TUCHET. [See TOUCHET.]

TUCKER, ABRAHAM (1705-1774), philosopher, born in London on 2 Sept. 1705, was the son of a London merchant, descended from a Somerset family, by Judith, daughter of Abraham Tillard. His parents dying during his infancy, he was left to the guardianship of his uncle, Sir Isaac Tillard. Sir Isaac was an honourable and generous man, who earned the warm gratitude of his nephew both by his precept and by his example. He was less distinguished for literary than for religious culture, and when the boy had to write formal letters to relations told him to adopt as a model the epistles of St. Paul. Tucker was at a school at Bishop Stortford till 1721, when he was entered as a gentloman commoner at Merton College, Oxford. There, besides studying philosophy and mathematics, he became a good French and Italian scholar, and cultivated a considerable talent for music. He was entered at the Inner Temple, and made himself a fair lawyer, though he was never called to the bar, and only used his knowledge in the discharge of his duties as justice of the peace. He made a few vacation tours, one of them on the continent, and in 1727 bought Betchworth Castle, near Dorking, with a considerable landed estate. He studied agriculture carefully, and made collections from works upon this subject. On 8 Feb. 1786 he married Dorothy, daughter of Edward Barker of East Betchworth, cursitor baron of the exchequer. She died on 7 May 1754, leaving two daughters. He is said to have been a most affectionate husband, and transcribed his correspondence with his wife, calling it a 'Picture of artless Love.' After her death he undertook the education of his daughters. He cared little for politics, and refused to stand for the county. Once he attended a county meeting at Epsom, and was ridiculed in a ballad by Sir Joseph Mawbey [q. v.], which represented him as overwhelmed by the eloquence of the whig leaders. He made fun of his own performance, and set the ballad to music.

About 1750 he began to write the book by which he is known, 'The Light of Nature Pursued.' He spent much time and labour over this, writing out the whole twice and translating classical authors to improve his style. He found, however, that 'correction was not his talent' (Introduction), and finally made little alteration in the first draft. In 1763 he published a specimen on 'Freewill, Foreknowledge, and Fate, by Edward Search,' which was criticised in the 'Monthly Review.' Tucker replied to some strictures in a very good-humoured pamphlet called 'Man in Quest of himself, by Cuthbert Comment,' 1763. In 1768 he printed the first four volumes of his book, still calling himself 'Edward Search.' The last three were posthumously published, edited by his daughter Judith, in 1778. He became blind in 1771. He accepted the infirmity with admirable equanimity, laughed at the blunders into which it led him, and invented a machine to enable himself to write. His daughter attended to him most affectionately, transcribed all his work for the press, and learnt enough Greek to be able to read to him his favourite authors. He finished his book in 1774, and died with 'perfect calmness and resignation' on 20 Nov. in the same year. There is a tablet to his memory in Dorling church. Tucker, though not strong, was a man of very active habits. He rose early to work at his book, and took regular exercise. In the country he superintended the management of his estates. In London, where he spent some months of the year, he was fond of the society of congenial spirits, and famous for his skill in 'Socratic disputations.' He kept up his walking in town by various pretexts, going from his house in Great James Street to St. Paul's to see what it was o'clock. He does not seem to have been known in literary circles, and his chief friend was a cousin, James Tillard, known only as one of the objects of Warburton's antipathy. A portrait, by Say, was at Betchworth Castle.

Tucker's eldest daughter, Judith, inherited his estates, and died unmarried on 26 Nov. 1794. His other daughter, Dorothea Maria, married Sir Henry Paulet St. John, bart., of Dogmersfield Park, Hampshire, on 27 Oct. 1763, and died on 5 May 1768, leaving an only child, Sir H. P. St. John Mildmay, who prefixed a short notice of his grandfather's life to the 1805 edition of the 'Light of Nature.' Betchworth Park was bought in 1831 by Henry Thomas Hope, who dismantled the house and added the park to that of Deepdene. The ruins of the house remain. Tucker is an example of a very rare species—the philosophical humourist, and is called by Mackintosh a 'metaphysical Montaigne.' The resemblance consists in the frankness and simplicity with which Tucker expounds his rather artless speculations, as he might have done in talking to a friend. He was an excellent country squires, not more widely read than the better specimens of his class, but of singularly vivacious and ingenious intellect. His illustrations, taken from the commonest events and objects, are singularly bright and happy. He has little to say upon purely metaphysical points, in which he accepts Locke as his great authority; but his psychological and ethical remarks, though unsystematic and desultory, are full of interest. He was obviously much influenced by Hartley, whom, however, he seems to have disliked. His chief interest was in ethical discussions. Paley, in the preface to his 'Moral and Political Philosophy,' confesses his obligations to Tucker, and their doctrines are substantially the same. Paley found in Tucker more original thinking upon the subjects treated 'than in any other [writer], not to say than in all others put together.' He tried, he says, to state compactly and methodically the thoughts diffused through Tucker's 'long, various, and irregular work.' Tucker's garrulity and constant repetitions have no doubt repelled readers who cannot stand seven volumes of rambling philosophical gossip, but it is impossible to dip into any chapter without finding some charm in the quaint and good-humoured naïveté of the writer. Hazlitt tried to make Tucker acceptable by an abridgment (1807), which, though apparently well executed, loses the dramatic charm of Tucker's erratic speculations. The book, if philosophically obsolete, has charmed many other critics. Mackintosh praises him with discrimination, and gives some specimens of his felicities (Ethical Philosophy, 1872, p. 174, &c.; MACKINTOSH, Miscell. Works, 1861, pp. 83-5, and Life, i. 455). In Sir James Stephen's essay upon Isaac Taylor in the 'Ecclesiastical Biography' is a warm eulogy upon Tucker, followed by an imitation of one of his best chapters, the 'Vision.'

Tucker's works are: 1. 'The Country Gentleman's Advice to his Son on the Subject of Party Clubs,' 1765. 2. 'Freewill, Foreknowledge, and Fate: a Fragment by Edward Search,' 1763. 3. 'Man in Quest of himself, by Outhort Comment,' 1763 (reprinted in Parré's 'Metaphysical Tracts', 1837). 4. 'The Light of Nature Pursued, by Edward Search,' 4 vols., 1768; the remaining three volumes, as 'Poethumous Worke of Abraham Tucker,' edited by his daughter, appeared in 1778; second edition, with a 'life' by Mildmay (see above), in 7 vols. 8vo, appeared in 1805; a third edition in 2 vols. 8vo (with the 'life') in 1834; reprinted in 1836, 1837, 1842, 1848; it was also published in America in 1831 and later. 5. 'Vocal Sounds, by Edward Search,' privately printed in 1778; an attempt to fix the sounds represented by letters, with a queer specimen of English hexameters.

[Life prefixed to his works as above; Manning and Bray's Surrey, i. 568-9, iii. p. cvii.]
L. S.

TUCKER, BENJAMIN (1762-1829), secretary of the admiralty and surveyor-general of the duchy of Cornwall, son of Benjamin Tucker (d. Orediton, 1817), a warrant officer in the navy, by Rachel, daughter of John Lyne of Liskeard, was born on 18 Jan. 1762. His brother was for many years foreman of shipwrights in Plymouth dockyard. Here received a good education, and was brought up in the navy. In 1792 he was purser of the Assistance; in April 1796 he was appointed purser of the Pompée, one of the Channel fleet. From her he was moved in January 1798 to the London, which in the course of the summer joined the Mediterranean fleet, then off Cadix under the command of the Earl of St. Vincent [see JERVIS, JOHN]. On 11 July 1798 he was discharged from the London as St. Vincent's secretary, and from that time his career was practically identified with St. Vincent's. He continued with him during the remainder of his time in the Mediterranean; was again with him when he commanded the fleet off Brest, and when St. Vincent was appointed first lord of the admiralty, when his intimate knowledge of the working of the service, perhaps, too, of the rascalities practised in the dockyards, rendered his assistance most valuable in the war which St. Vincent waged against the prevalent iniquities. He was for some time one of the commissioners of the navy, and was then appointed second secretary of the admiralty; and, though his name did not come prominently before the public, it was well known to all who were directly interested that in this attack he was St. Vincent's main support. There were of course many who said that he was dishonest and unscrupulous; that his one object was to curry favour with his chief; and that, as St. Vincent wanted evidence, he took care that the evidence should be forthcoming. In one instance, the attack on Sir Home Rigge Popham [q. v.], he seems to have been mistaken; Popham's innocence of the charge was fully established; but the evidence, which Tucker certainly did not invent, was sufficient to render an investigation necessary. After St. Vincent retired, Tucker was on 28 June 1808 appointed surveyor-general of the duchy of Cornwall, in which capacity, on 3 March 1812, he presented to the prince regent 'an elegant snuff-box made of silver' extracted from the Wheal Duchy silver mine at Oalsstock (Gent. Mag. 1812, i. 286). He had previously drawn up in 1810, and presented to the duke, a 'Report' as to the feasibility of forming a roadstead for the Scilly Isles. He obtained a long lease of Trematon Castle, near Saltash, and built the modern house. He died at the house of his brother Joseph in Bedford Row, London, on 11 Dec. 1829. He was twice married, and left issue. His eldest son, Jedediah Stephens Tucker, published in 1844 'Memoirs of the Earl of St. Vincent' (2 vols. 8vo), mainly written from his father's notes, put together for the express purpose, and with St. Vincent's knowledge. Another son, John Jervie Tucker, born in 1802, died an admiral in 1886.

[Official documents in the Public Record Office; information from the family; Gent. Mag. 1830, i. 88; Boase and Courtney's Bibl. Cornub. ii. 808, iii. 1868; J. S. Tucker's Memoirs of the Earl of St. Vincent; Branton's Life of the Earl of St. Vincent; Raikes's Memoir of Sir J. Branton, p. 421. See also the references under POPHAM, SIR HOME RIGGE, a remarkable letter of Tucker in Naval Chronicle, xiii. 368; and the list of pamphlets under JARVIS, JOHN, EARL OF ST. VINCENT.]
J. K. L.

TUCKER, CHARLOTTE MARIA (1821-1808), known by the pseudonym 'A. L. O. E.', i.e. A Lady Of England, writer for children, born at Friern Hatch, Barnet, on 8 May 1821, was the sixth child and third daughter of Henry St. George Tucker [q. v.] and his wife Jane, daughter of Robert Boswell of Edinburgh, a writer to the signet, who was nearly related to Johnson's biographer. In 1822 the Tucker family settled in London at 3 Upper Portland Place. Charlotte was educated at home, and as a girl was fond of writing verses and plays. In her father's house she saw much society; among her father's friends were the Duke of Wellington, Lord Metcalfe, Lord Glenelg, and Sir Henry Pottinger. Throughout life Charlotte was particularly devoted to a younger sister, Dorothea Laura, who married, on 19 Oct. 1852, Otho Hamilton.

About 1849 Miss Tucker commenced visiting the Marylebone workhouse, but it was not until after the death of her father on 14 June 1851 that she began her literary career. Her first book, 'Claremont Tales,' was published in 1852, and from that date until her death scarcely a year passed without one or more productions from her pen. She devoted the proceeds of her books to charitable purposes.

On the death of Mrs. Tucker in July 1869, the London house was given up, and for the next six years Charlotte lived with her brother St. George at Braoknell, Windlesham, and Binfield. For some time Miss Tucker had thought of undertaking missionary work in India, and finding herself in 1875 without home ties, and with sufficient means to render her independent of missionary funds, she set to work at the age of fifty-four to study Hindustani. But, although she learned the grammar and construction with ease, she never mastered any Indian language colloquially. She went to India as an independent member of the Church of England Zenana Society in October 1875. From Bombay she went to Allahabad, and thence to Amritsar, which she reached on 1 Nov. 1875. In December 1876 she moved to Batala, a populous city to the north-east of Lahore, which was thenceforth the centre of her missionary work. In 1878 the Baring High School for native Christian boys was permanently established at Batala, and under its shadow Miss Tucker resided, taking great interest in the pupils. At times she was the only Englishwoman within twenty miles. She helped by her liberality to found a 'plough' school for Indian boys not yet Christians, who as soon as they became converts were drafted into the high school.

Miss Tucker's work consisted in zenana visiting and in writing booklets—allegories and parables—for translation into the vernacular dialects of India. Many of her books were published by the Christian Literary Society and the Punjab Religious Book Society, and sold more widely than almost any other of their productions. At the end of 1885 Miss Tucker had a serious illness, and never fully recovered. In 1893 she fell ill again, and she died at Amritsar on 2 Dec. 1893. She was buried at Batala on 5 Dec., in accordance with the terms of her will, without a coffin, at a cost not exceeding five rupees. There is an inscription to her memory in the Uran dialect in the church at Batala, and a memorial brass was placed in Lahore Cathedral.

Miss Tucker was a woman of tireless energy and stern determination; but her sociable temperament endeared her to all with whom she came in contact in India, both natives and English. Her industry was unceasing. The British Museum 'Catalogue' has 142 separate entries of books published by her between 1854 and 1893. Some are short tales written for the series of simple story books issued by Nelson, the Glasgow publisher; others, like 'Wings and Stings' (1855), 'The Rambles of a Rat' (1854), and 'Old Friends with New Faces' (1858), are of a more ambitious character. A few of her productions reached two, or in rare cases three, editions. Most of the tales are allegorical in form, with an obtrusive moral.

[Agnes Giberne's A Lady of England: the Life and Letters of Charlotte Maria Tucker, 1895. A very slight criticism of A. L. O. E. as a writer by Mrs. Marshall appears in Women Novelists of Queen Victoria's Reign, 1897, pp. 203-7; Allibone's Dict.] E. L.

TUCKER, HENRY ST. GEORGE (1771-1851), Indian financier, born on 15 Feb. 1771 in the island of St. George's, Bermudas, was the eldest son of Henry Tucker (1742-1802), secretary, and afterwards president, of the council of the Bermudas, by Frances (d. 1813), daughter of the governor, George Bruere (d. 1780). Thomas Tudor Tucker [q. v.] was a younger brother. In 1781 he was sent to his grandfather's in England, and went to Dr. Hamilton's school at Hampstead till December 1785, when a friend of his aunt's got him a midshipman's berth on an East Indiaman, much to the displeasure of his father. Having landed at Calcutta in the William Pitt in August 1786, he was received by his uncle Bruere, secretary to government, through whose influence he obtained clerical employment in various government offices, being at one time engaged by Sir William Jones as private secretary. In 1792 he was given a company's writership, his covenant bearing date 28 March. After serving in the accountant-general's office and in the revenue and judicial department, he was appointed member and secretary of a commission for revising establishments. About this time he drew up a plan for starting a bank, partly under government control, afterwards realised in the Bank of Bengal. During the apprehensions of a French invasion he took an active part in the volunteer movement, being captain of the cavalry corps and commandant of the militia. Going to Madras in 1799, he acted for a time as military secretary to Lord Wellesley, then directing the operations against Tippu Sahib. On returning to Calcutta he was appointed, 29 Oct. 1799, secretary to government in the revenue and judicial department, in the place of Sir George Barlow. On 11 March 1801 he was appointed accountant-general, but left this post on 30 April 1804 to join the firm of Cockerell, Traill, Palmer, & Co., as managing partner. Lord Wellesley, though displeased at his desertion, acknowledged his services in a minute dated 1 May 1804. In July 1805, two days after arriving in Calcutta as governor-general for the second time, Lord Cornwallis invited Tucker to return to the accountant-generalship. Tucker declined, but in October 1805 he accepted a similar invitation from Sir George Barlow. Indian finances being at a low ebb, he was compelled to advocate sweeping retrenchments, and in consequence incurred some unpopularity. He denounced, on the score of economy, the forward policy which Lord Lake was pursuing against the Mahratta and Rajput chiefs, saying, in a letter to Sir George Barlow, 'Let military men lead our armies, but do not make statesmen and financiers of men who have not been formed such either by nature or training.'

On 10 Dec. 1806 Tucker was sentenced by the chief justice, Sir Henry Russell, to six months' imprisonment and to pay a fine of four thousand rupees for an attempted rape. His sentence did not affect his official status, and immediately after his liberation on 11 June 1807 he was appointed member of the commission for superintending the settlement of the ceded and conquered districts; but his views on the advantages of a permanent settlement being regarded with disfavour, it was arranged in 1808 that he should retire from the commission. On 28 March 1808 he was appointed supernumerary member of the board of revenue; on 6 Jan. 1809 acting secretary, and on 26 Jan. 1809 secretary, in the public department. In January 1811 he went to England with the intention of leaving the service, and on his arrival received a donation of fifty thousand rupees from the court of directors as a mark of their approbation.

In about a year he returned to India, where, on 8 Aug. 1812, he was appointed secretary to government in the colonial and financial department, a post specially created for him by Lord Minto. Before a despatch from the court of directors disallowing this arrangement had reached Calcutta he had been appointed, 28 Dec. 1814, acting chief secretary. On 7 June 1815 he left India on leave to St. Helena, formally resigned the service during the voyage, and proceeded to England. Lord Moira had selected him for the governorship of Java, but he never returned to the east.

In April 1820 he was elected a director of the East India Company, notwithstanding the opposition aroused by his refusal to pledge himself to support missionary enterprise in India. Elected in 1834 chairman of the court, he took a prominent part in many forgotten controversies, and led the protest of the directors against the first Afghan war. The invasion of Afghanistan, he held, was directed not against a real but ostensible enemy. The Russian advance constituted a European rather than an Asiatic question, and could only be dealt with by her majesty's government in Europe, where, he believed, 'a single monosyllable would probably have arrested the progress of Russia if addressed to her with firmness and good faith' (Memorials of Indian Government, p. 306). Strongly opposed to free trade, he deplored 'the fatal infatuation, as I consider it, which has caused this country to depart from its ancient policy in a way to involve large classes of our people and many valuable interests in bankruptcy and ruin' (Memorials, p. 463). He regarded the Indian opium monopoly as an intolerable evil; he opposed the 'over-education' of young men for the Indian civil service: 'We do not want literary razors to cut blocks for which intellectual hatchets are more suitable;' and he thought that Lord Hastings had unwisely bestowed the liberty of the press on the varied population of India, 'a boon which could not fail to excite new feelings among them.'

Elected chairman of the court of directors for the second time in 1847, he nominated Lord Dalhousie for the governor-generalship. He resigned the office of director in April 1851, and on 14 June 1851 he died at his residence, 8 Upper Portland Place, and was buried at Kensal Green. A tablet to his memory was erected in the parish church at Crayford in Kent, where his family had owned property.

In August 1811 he was married at Caversham, Roxburghshire, to Jane (d. 1869), daughter of Robert Boswell, writer to the signet. Their third daughter was Charlotte Maria Tucker [q. v.] One of the sons, Henry Carra Tucker, entered the Bengal civil service in 1831, was created a C.B., retired in 1861, and died in 1875.

Tucker wrote: 1. 'Remarks on the Plans of Finance lately promulgated by the Court of Directors and by the Supreme Government of India,' London, 1821, 8vo. 2. 'A Review of the Financial Statement of the East India Company in 1824,' London, 1825, 8vo. 3. 'Tragedies: "Harold" and "Camoëns,"' London, 1835, 8vo.

[Memorials of Indian Government, being a selection from the papers of Henry St. George Tucker, ed. John W. Kaye, London, 1858; Kaye's Life and Correspondence of Henry St. George Tucker, London, 1854; Trial of Henry St. George Tucker, London, 1810.] S. W.

TUCKER, JOSIAH (1712-1799), economist and divine, was born at Laugharne, Carmarthenshire, in 1712. His father, a farmer, inherited a small estate near Aberystwyth, and thence sent his son to Ruthin school, Denbighshire. Tucker obtained an exhibition at St. John's College, Oxford. His father gave him his own horse to save him the long journey on foot. Tucker after a time dutifully returned the horse, and afterwards walked with his knapsack to college and back. He graduated B.A. in 1739, M.A. in 1739, and D.D. in 1755. In 1737 he became curate of St. Stephen's Church at Bristol, and two years later rector of All Saints' Church in the same city. He was appointed to a minor canonry in the cathedral, and came under the notice of Bishop Butler, to whom he was for a time domestic chaplain. It was to Tucker that Butler made his often-quoted remark (see under BUTLER, JOSEPH) about the possibility of nations going mad, like men. On the death of Alexander Stopford Catcott [q. v.] in 1749 Tucker was appointed by the chancellor to the rectory of St. Stephen's, worth about 60*l.* a year. At Bristol Tucker was naturally led to take a keen interest in matters of politics and trade. After some early tracts he first became generally known by pamphlets in favour of the measures for naturalising foreign protestants and Jews. His view was so unpopular that he was burnt in effigy at Bristol along with his pamphlets. Seward adds that he afterwards became so popular as to be drawn through the streets in his carriage. He had, at any rate, considerable political influence upon his parishioners. In 1754 Robert (afterwards earl) Nugent [q. v.] was elected for Bristol, and was warmly supported by Tucker. Nugent's influence probably contributed to his preferment. He was appointed to the third prebendal stall at Bristol on 28 Oct. 1756, and on 13 July 1758 to the deanery of Gloucester. Independently of his politics, Tucker had already a high reputation for his knowledge of trade, and in 1755 was requested by Thomas Hayter [q. v.], then bishop of Norwich and preceptor to the princes, to draw up a treatise called 'Elements of Commerce' for the instruction of the future king. A fragment was privately printed, but it was never completed. Tucker, as dean of Gloucester, saw something of Warburton, who became bishop in 1759, having previously been dean of Bristol. They did not like each other, and, according to Tucker (reported in Gent. Mag. 1799), the bishop said that the dean made a religion of his trade and a trade of his religion. According to another version, the person said to make a trade of his religion was the preferment-hunting Samuel Squire [q. v.], who succeeded Warburton as dean of Bristol (NICHOLS, Illustrations, ii, 35; cf. WATSON, Warburton, p. 496). Anyhow, as Bishop Newton testifies, Tucker had 'too little respect for his bishop,' and the bishop speaks as contemptuously of Tucker as of most of her people. Newton, however, adds that Tucker was an excellent dean, managing the estates well, living hospitably, and improving the deanery. In 1763 Tucker published a tract against 'going to war for the sake of trade,' which was translated by Turgot, who had previously translated one of the naturalisation pamphlets. He wrote in very complimentary terms to Tucker some years later, and sent him a copy of the 'Réflexions sur la Formation des Richesses' (Œuvres de Turgot, ii, 601-4). He mentions a visit of Tucker to Paris, but they were not personally acquainted.

Tucker next became conspicuous in the controversy which arose in 1771 as to the proposed abolition of clerical subscription to the thirty-nine articles. He defended the demands of the church of England against Kippis, but, as in other cases, took a line of his own, and admitted that some relaxation of the terms of subscription was desirable. His remarks upon the history of the controversy between Calvinists and Arminians seem to show that his claim to have studied theology as well as trade was not without foundation. He soon returned to economic questions, and became famous by his writings upon the American troubles. He maintained in various energetic pamphlets that a separation from the colonies was desirable. He held that the supposed advantage of the colonial trade to the mother country was a delusion. On the other hand, he maintained that the colonies turned adrift would fall out with each other, and be glad to return to political union. The policy pleased nobody in England, and Tucker, though his views were approved in later years by many of the laissez-faire economists, was for a time treated as a 'Cassandra,' under which name he published some contributions to the newspapers (see NICHOLS, Illustrations, vii. 462). The most popular of his American tracts was 'Cui Bono?' in the form of letters addressed to Necker (1781), arguing that the war was a mistake for all the nations concerned. In the same year he published a book upon 'Civil Government,' attacking Locke's principles as tending to democracy and supporting the British constitution. In 1785 he again applied his theories to the disputes about Irish trade with Great Britain.

Tucker's first wife was the widow of Francis Woodward of Grimsbury, Gloucestershire, and he educated his stepson, Richard Woodward [q. v.], who subsequently became dean of Ologher and bishop of Cloyne. In 1781 Tucker married his housekeeper, Mrs. Crowe. He became infirm, and in 1790 desired to resign his rectory at Bristol on condition that his curate might succeed to it. The chancellor refused to give the required promise, until, at Tucker's request, his petitioners signed a petition on behalf of the curate. Tucker then resigned, and the curate was appointed. Tucker died on 4 Nov. 1799 of 'gradual decay,' and was buried in the south transept of Gloucester Cathedral, where a monument was erected to his memory. His portrait, painted by G. Russell, was twice engraved (BROOKLYN, p. 472).

Tucker was a very shrewd though a rather crotchety and inconsistent writer. He is praised by McCulloch and others who shared his view of the inutility of colonies; and he argued very forcibly that a 'shop-keeping nation' would not improve its trade by beating its customers. The war with the colonies would, he said, hereafter appear to be as absurd as the crusades. He retained, as McCulloch complains, a good many of the prejudices which later economists sought to explode. He is not clear about the 'balance of trade;' he believes in the wickedness of forestalling and regrating, and wishes to stimulate population by legislation. In spite, however, of his inconsistencies and narrowness of views, he deserves credit, as Turgot perceived, for attacking many of the evils of monopolies, and was so far in sympathy with the French economists and with Adam Smith. He deserves the credit of anticipating some of Adam Smith's arguments against various forms of monopoly, but, though he made many good points, he was not equal to forming a comprehensive system.

Tucker's works are: 1. 'Brief History of the Principles of Methodism,' Oxford, 1742, 8vo (answered in Wesley's 'Principles of a Methodist,' 1746). 2. 'Two Dissertations' (in answer to Chubb), 1749. 3. 'Brief Essay on the Advantages which . . . attend France and Great Britain with regard to Trade,' 1750; reprinted in McCulloch's 'Collection of Tracts,' 1859. 4. 'Impartial Enquiry into Benefits . . . from use of Low-priced Spirituous Liquors,' 1751, 8vo. 5. 'Earnest Address to the Common People concerning Cockthrowing on Shrove Tuesday,' reprinted 1787, was published about this time, and advertised in No. 7. 6. 'Reflections on . . . Naturalisation of Foreign Protestants' (two parts), 1751, 8vo (reprinted 1806). 7. 'Letter . . . concerning Naturalisations,' &c., and a second letter, with opinions of lawyers, 1753, 8vo (in defence of the act for naturalising Jews). 8. 'Reflections on the Expediency of opening the Trade to Turkey,' 1753, 8vo. 9. 'The Elements of Commerce and Theory of Taxes' (privately printed), 1755, 8vo. 10. 'Instructions for Travellers' (privately printed), 1757, 4to. 11. 'Manifest Causes of the Increase of the Poor,' &c. [1760], 4to. 12. 'The Case of going to War for the Sake of . . . Trade . . . being a Fragment of a greater Work,' 1763 (translated by Turgot). 13. 'The Causes of the Dearthness of Provisions assigned,' 1766 (attributed to Tucker). 14. 'Apology for the present Church of England . . . occasioned by the Petition for abolishing Subscription,' 1772, 8vo. 15. 'Letters to the Rev. Dr. Kippis,' 1773 (on same occasion). 16. 'Four Letters on important National Subjects . . . to the Earl of Shelburne,' 1773, 8vo. 17. 'Religious Intolerance no Part . . . of the Mosaic or Christian Dispensations,' 1774, 8vo. 18. 'Brief and Dispassionate View of the Difficulties attending the Trinitarian, Arian, and Socinian Theories,' 1774, 8vo. 19. 'Four Tracts, together with Two Sermons on Political and Commercial Subjects,' 1775, 8vo; to a third edition (1775) is added a fifth tract, also published separately. 20. 'Review of Lord Viscount Clare's Conduct as Representative of Bristol' [1775], 8vo. 21. 'The Respective Pleas and Answers of the Mother Country and of the Colonies . . .,' 1775, 8vo (McCulloch). 22. 'Letter to Edmund Burke,' 1775, 8vo (answer to his speech of 22 March 1775). 23. 'An Humble Address and Earnest Appeal to Respectable Personages . . .,' 1775, 8vo

(on separation from the colonies). 24. 'A Series of Answers to . . . Objections against separating from the Rebelious Colonies . . .', 1776, 8vo. 25. 'True Interests of Britain set forth in regard to the Colonies,' 1776, 8vo (published at Philadelphia). 26. 'Dispassionate Thoughts on the American War,' 1780, 8vo. 27. Cui Bono? An Enquiry what Benefit can arise to the English or Americans, French, Spanish, or Dutch, from the greatest Victories in the present War, 1781, 8vo (a series of letters addressed to Neckar. There is a French translation, 1782). 28. 'Treatise concerning Civil Government,' 1781, 8vo. 29. 'Reflections on present low Price of Coarse Wools,' 1782, 8vo. 30. 'Sequel to Sir W. Jones's Pamphlet on the Principles of Government,' 1784, 8vo. 31. 'Reflections on present Matters of Disputes between Great Britain and Ireland,' 1786, 8vo. 32. 'Union or Separation, written some Years since by Dr. Tucker, now first published with a Tract on the same Subject, by Dr. Clarke, &c.,' 1799. 33. 'Dean Tucker's Reflections on the Terrors of Invasion,' published in the newspapers in 1779, were reprinted in 1806. Tucker also published six sermons in 1772, seventeen in 1776, and a single sermon or two.

[Gent. Mag. 1799, pp. 1000-3; Barrett's Bristol (1789), p. 612; Seward's Anecdotes, ii. 438-41; Le Neve's Fasti, i. 224, 446; Watson's Life of Warburton, p. 496; Thos. Newton's Autobiography; Letters of an Eminent Prelate (1809), pp. 403, 443, 452; McCulloch's Lit. of Political Economy, pp. 61, 63, 66, 90, 91, 192, 239, 269, 270, 278.] L. S.

TUCKER, THOMAS, TUDOR (1775-1852), rear-admiral, third of the eight sons (all in the public service) of Henry Tucker, secretary of the council of the Bermudas, was born on 29 June 1775. Henry St. George Tucker [q. v.] was his eldest brother. After two voyages in the service of the East India Company, he entered the navy in 1798 as master's mate of the Argo, with Captain William Clark, whom he followed to the Sampson and the Victorious, in which last he was present at the reduction of the Cape of Good Hope. On 21 March 1798 he was appointed acting lieutenant of the Suffolk on the East India station, in which and afterwards in the Swift sloop, again in the Victorious and in the Sceptre, he served as acting lieutenant for nearly four years. On her way homewards the Sceptre was lost in Table Bay, on 5 Nov. 1799. A great part of her crew perished, and Tucker was left to find his own passage to England. On arriving in London he learned that the admiralty refused to confirm his irregular promotion, and, after passing a second examination, he was made a lieutenant on 20 May 1800, into the Prince George, in which, and afterwards in the Prince, he served in the Channel fleet till the peace. In June 1803 he was appointed to the Northumberland, carrying the flag of Rear-admiral Cochrane, at the first off Ferrol, and later on in the West Indies, where, on 6 Feb. 1806, he was present in the battle of St. Domingo [see COCHRANE, SIR ALEXANDER FORRESTER INGLIS; DUCKWORTH, SIR JOHN THOMAS]. He was then appointed by the admiral acting commander of the Dolphin, and, in succession, of several other ships; but the rank was not confirmed till 15 Feb. 1808. In April he was moved into the Epervier, in which, and afterwards in the Cherub, he repeatedly distinguished himself in the capture of the enemy's vessels even when protected by batteries, and in February 1810 he assisted in the reduction of Guadeloupe. On the special recommendation of the commander-in-chief, Sir Francis Laforey, he was promoted to post rank on 1 Aug. 1811, but was continued in the Cherub, which he took to England in September 1812, in charge of a large convoy.

He was immediately ordered to refit the ship for foreign service, and early in December sailed for South America, and on to the Pacific, where, at Juan Fernandez, he joined Captain James Hillyar [q. v.] of the Phoebe, with whom he continued, and assisted in the capture of the United States frigate Essex, near Valparaiso, on 28 March 1814, when Tucker was severely wounded. The small force of the Cherub had, necessarily, little influence on the event of the action; but in the previous blockade she had rendered important service in helping to frustrate the enemy's attempts to escape. In August 1815 she returned to England, and was paid off. Tucker afterwards commanded the Andromeda and the Comus for a few months, but after May 1816 had no employment. On 4 July 1840 he was nominated a C.B.; and on 1 Oct. 1846 was put on the retired list, with the rank of rear-admiral. He died in London on 20 July 1852. He married, in 1811, Anne Byam Wyke, eldest daughter of Daniel Hill of Antigua, and left issue a son and three daughters.

[Marshall's Roy. Nav. Biogr. vi. (suppl. pt. ii.) 419; O'Byrne's Nav. Biogr. Dict.; Gent. Mag. 1852, ii. 539.] J. K. L.

TUCKER, WILLIAM (1558?-1621), dean of Lichfield. [See TOOKER.]

TUCKER, WILLIAM (1589?-1640?), colonist, born in England about 1589, seems to have gone out to Virginia in 1610 in the Mary and James (see NEILL, op. cit.) He was one of the first subscribers to the Virginia Company, and in 1617 sent over two men in his service to the colony, himself following in 1618. He apparently devoted himself to trading voyages as well as to planting, and probably from this obtained the title 'Captain' by which reference is generally made to him. To judge from instructions which he left on one of his visits to England, he was a shrewd and hard man of business (Cal. State Papers, Colonial, 1574-1600, p. 151). He resided at Kiecovtan (afterwards Elizabeth City), where he had an estate of eight hundred acres and a large establishment, and on 30 July 1619 he was elected member for that city to the first assembly of Virginia. He took a leading part in the fighting arising out of the massacre in the colony by the Indians in 1622. Before 1623 he had become a member of the council of Virginia, and apparently was reappointed in subsequent years till his death. In 1630, and again in 1632 and 1633, he made voyages to England. On the last of these occasions he made an application to the privy council for a renewal of the ancient charter of Virginia, and for restraint of the Dutch from the trade. He seems to have died in England, probably before 1640. He married, before 1618, Mary, daughter of Robert Thompson of Watton, Hertfordshire, who was aunt to the first Baron Havershham.

[Brown's Genesis of the United States, ii. 1034; Neill's Virginia Carolorum, p. 40; Calendar of State Papers, Colonial, 1674-1660.]

C. A. H.

TUCKEY, JAMES KINGSTON (1776-1810), commander in the navy and explorer, youngest son of Thomas Tuckey of Greshill, near Mallow, co. Cork, by Elizabeth, daughter of the Rev. James Kingston of Donoughmore, was born in August 1776. His parents died in his infancy, and he was brought up by his maternal grandmother. After a voyage to the West Indies in a merchant ship, he was in 1793, by the influence of his kinsman, Captain Francis John Hartwell, afterwards commissioner of the navy, placed on board the Suffolk, going out to the East Indies with the broad pennant of Commodore Peter Rainier [q. v.], and in her he was present at the reduction of Trincomalee in August 1795, and of Amboyna, where he was wounded in the left arm by a fragment of a shell. He was afterwards put in command of a prize brig, and ordered to cruise off the island, to prevent a threatened insurrection of the natives. By the bursting of a gun his right arm was broken. He had no surgeon, and set it himself. It had to be broken again by the surgeon of the Suffolk, with the result that he never quite recovered its use. In January 1798 he assisted in suppressing a serious mutiny on board the Suffolk, and Rainier, in approving his conduct, gave him an acting order as lieutenant, and appointed him to the Fox frigate. Being at Madras in February 1799, when the Sibylle was sailing to look out for the French frigate Forte [see COOK, EDWARD, 1770?-1799], Tuckey, with a party of seamen from the Fox, volunteered for service in her, and took part in capturing the Forte a few days later. He was confirmed in the rank of lieutenant on 6 Oct. 1800. He rejoined the Fox in the Red Sea, and, after returning to Bombay, was again in the Red Sea in the end of 1800. He suffered much from the heat, and laid the foundations of 'a hepatic derangement,' from which he suffered all the rest of his life. He was invalided to India, and was sent home with despatches.

In 1802 he was appointed first lieutenant the Calcutta, going out to New South Wales to establish a colony at Port Phillip. Tuckey remained in the Calcutta the whole time, and made a complete survey of the harbour of Port Phillip and a careful examination of the adjacent coast and country. On his return to England in the autumn of 1804 he published 'The Account of a Voyage to establish a Colony at Port Phillip in Bass's Strait . . . in the years 1802, 1803-4' (1805, 8vo). This dedication to Sir Francis Hartwell is dated 'Portsmouth, 29 October 1801.' The Calcutta was then sent out to St. Helena to convoy the homeward-bound East Indiaman. On the way home she was met by the Rocheport squadron and was captured. Her captain, Woodriff, was exchanged some eighteen months later; but for Tuckey no exchange was permitted, and he was detained a prisoner in France, mostly at Verdun, till the peace of 1814. During this time he wrote a comprehensive work, 'Maritime Geography and Statistics,' which was published on his return to England (1815, 4 vols. 8vo). He was promoted to the rank of commander on 27 Aug. 1814. After the peace of 1815 the government determined to send out an expedition to endeavour to solve the problem of the Congo. Many officers thrown out of employment by the peace applied for the command, which was conferred on Tuckey, mainly, it would seem, in recognition of his geographical studies as shown in the 'Maritime Geography.' It was indeed objected that his health was delicate, but he urged that it would improve in a warm climate, and so it was settled that he should go. There is no doubt that his two published works showed Tuckney as a scientific geographer; his service record showed him to be a good officer, and it was probably thought that some compensation was due to him for his long imprisonment; but the idea of choosing this particular reward or compensation for a man affected with chronic disease of the liver, and that without any medical inspection, seems preposterous.

He sailed early in 1816 in a specially built vessel, named the Congo, and accompanied by the Dorothy storeship. The Dorothy remained in the lower river, while the Congo pushed up as far as the cataracts. Tuckney then undertook a journey by land, to see what was above the cataracts, but his health completely broke down, and he was obliged to return. Utterly worn out, he got back to the Congo on 17 Sept.; on the following day he was sent down to the Dorothy, and on board her he died on 4 Oct., 'of exhaustion rather than of disease.' But the report of the surgeon was 'that since leaving England he never enjoyed good health, the hepatic functions being generally in a deranged state.' His journal, exactly as he wrote it, was published, by permission of the admiralty, under the title of 'Narrative of an Expedition to explore the River Zaire, usually called the Congo, in South Africa, in 1816, under the direction of Captain J. K. Tuckney, R.N.' (1818, 4to). While at Verdun in 1806 Tuckney married Margaret Stuart, a fellow-prisoner, daughter of the captain of an Indianman, by whom he left issue.

[His works as mentioned, especially the introduction to the Narrative of the Congo Expedition, p. xlvii, where the anonymous editor has given a detailed memoir.] J. K. I.

TUCKNEY, ANTHONY, D.D. (1599-1670), puritan divine, son of William Tuckney, vicar of Kilton, near Boston, Lincolnshire, was born there, and baptised on 22 Sept. 1609. He was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, being admitted pensioner 4 June 1613, and graduating B.A. 1616-17, M.A. 1620. Being elected fellow (1619), he did not at once reside, but became household chaplain to Theophilus Clinton, fourth earl of Lincoln. Returning to the university, he pursued for ten years a distinguished career as tutor, among his pupils being Benjamin Whichcote [q. v.], Henry Pierrepont, first marquis of Dorchester [q. v.], and his brother William Pierrepont [q. v.]. He commenced B.D. in 1627. On 2 Oct. 1629 he was elected to succeed Edward Wright, deceased, as 'mayor's chaplain' or 'town preacher' at Boston, where his cousin, John Cotton (1585-1652), was vicar. When Cotton resigned (7 May 1633) with a view to migration to New England, Tuckney was chosen (22 July) by the corporation to succeed him. His puritanism, though not so pronounced as Cotton's, brought him into some trouble with the spiritual courts, but he was beloved by his parishioners. He founded (1635) a library, still existing, in a room over the church porch, giving many books to it. During the plague of 1637 he fearlessly ministered to his flock. He was chosen with Herbert Palmer [q. v.] as clerk for Lincoln diocese in the second convocation of 1640.

Tuckney was nominated in the ordinance of 12 June 1643 to be a member of the Westminster assembly of divines, he and Thomas Coleman ('rabbi Coleman') [q. v.] representing the county of Lincoln. He removed with his family to London, retaining the Boston vicarage at the desire of his parishioners, but transferring the salary (100*l.*) to his curate in charge. He was provided for in London by receiving the sequestered rectory of St. Michael-le-Querne, Cheapside. In the Westminster assembly Tuckney took a very important part, as chairman of committee, in the preparation of the doctrinal formularies; his wording was often adopted; in the larger catechism the exposition of the decalogue is almost entirely his. But, as he explained (1651) to Whichcote, 'in the assemblie, I gave my vote with others that the Confession of Faith, putt-out by Authoritie, shoulde not bee required to bee eyther sworne or subscribed-too; we having bin burnt in the laud in that kind before; but so as not to bee publicly preached or written against.'

On 11 April 1645 the assembly approved of his appointment as master of Emmanuel. He spent part of each year at Cambridge. On 30 March 1648 an ordinance was passed for making him Margaret professor of divinity; it does not seem to have taken effect, but in that year, the dogmatic work of the assembly being completed, he resigned his London rectory and removed his family to Cambridge. He was vice-chancellor that year, and on Good Friday, 15 March 1648-9, he waited on Edward Montagu, second earl of Manchester [q. v.], to congratulate him on his appointment as chancellor. In 1649 he commenced D.D. He tried to save William Sancroft [q. v.] from ejection (May 1651) from his fellowship at Emmanuel. Later in the same year (September-November 1651) occurred his memorable correspondence with Whichcote, in whose preaching he noted 'a vein of doctrine' which made him uneasy, as tending to rationalism. Yet his letters are not wholly unsympathetic; and to Tuckney in 1652 was dedicated 'The Light of Nature,' by Nathaniel Culverwel [q. v.] On 8 June 1653 he was admitted master of St. John's College, in the room of John Arrowsmith, D.D. [q. v.] In the same year he again acted as vice-chancellor. By the ordinance of 20 March 1653-4 he was appointed one of Cromwell's 'triers.' In 1655 he acted for Arrowsmith as regius professor of divinity, and on 1 Feb. 1655-6 succeeded him in the chair, to which should have been annexed the rectory of Somersham, Huntingdonshire. He was never a self-assertive man (Baxter thought him 'over humble'), but as master of St. John's he maintained his independence, showing 'more courage in opposing orders sent by the higher powers in those times than any of the heads of the university, nay, more than all of them' (CALAMY). Salter relates, as a college tradition, that in elections to fellowships at St. John's, 'he was determined to choose none but scholars, adding very wisely, they may deceive me in their godliness, they cannot in their scholarship.' He took great interest in the propagation of the gospel in America and the conversion of the Indians, corresponding with Cotton and raising contributions in the university. On 8 April 1659 the Boston corporation asked him to resign the vicarage; he did not actually do so till August 1660, when the corporation nominated Obadiah Howe [q. v.] 'if approved of' by Tuckney; if not, 'then he was requested to provide a most fit man.' He resigned in Howe's favour.

At the Restoration Tuckney's claim to Somersham rectory was admitted, but he did not long hold it; nor was he allowed to retain his mastership. Baker, no friend to puritans, writes indignantly of the motives which led the 'young men' of the college to 'turn upon their benefactor.' On 14 Feb. 1661 Nicholas Bullingham, the new dean, and twenty-three fellows, petitioned the king against Tuckney, their main complaint being that he did not come to common prayer in the chapel. On 26 March he was appointed a commissioner for the Savoy conference on the revision of the prayer-book; he never attended, 'al lodging his backwardness to speak' (BAXTER). While the conference was still sitting he was superseded in his mastership and his chair by royal mandate of 1 June. The sole disqualification specified was his age (sixty-two). A life pension of 100*l.* was duly paid him from the profits of Somersham. He was succeeded in his preferments by Peter Gunning [q. v.]

Removing to London in September 1661, Tuckney settled in the parish of St. Mary Axe, occasionally preaching in private. In the plague year (1665) he was the guest of Robert Piorrepoint at Colwick Hall, near Nottingham, where for some months he was placed under arrest for nonconformist preaching. He moved about in 1666, sojourning at Oundle and Warrington, Northamptonshire. His library, deposited at Scrivenors' Hall, was burned in the great fire. After short residences at Stockerston, Leicestershire, and Tottenham, Middlesex, he returned to London (1669) in bad health. He died in Spital Yard of jaundice and ecurry in February 1670, and was buried on 1 March in the church of St. Andrew Undershaft. His portrait was engraved by R. White. He was thrice married; his second wife was Mary (Willford), widow of Thomas Hill (d. 1658) [q. v.], whom he had succeeded as master of Emmanuel, and whose funeral sermon he preached; his third wife (whom he married on 30 Sept. 1668) was Sarah, widow of William Spurstows, D.D. [q. v.] By his first wife he had a son, Jonathan Tuckney (1639?-1693), educated at St. Paul's School, London, and Emmanuel College (M.A. 1659) and ejected from a fellowship at St. John's College in 1662; a man of good learning 'render'd useless by melancholy' (CALAMY); he died at Hackney in 1693, and left a son John, who was admitted to St. John's College on 7 May 1698, aged 18.

Tuckney published nothing but a catechism (1628) for use at Emmanuel, five single sermons (1643-56), and some verses in university collections (including an elegy on Cromwell); he edited 'John Cotton on Ecclesiastes,' 1654, 8vo, and on 'Canticles,' 1655, 8vo. Posthumous were: 1. 'Forty Sermons,' 1676, 4to. 2. 'Prælectiones Theologicae,' Amsterdam, 1679, 4to; edited, like this preceding, by his son Jonathan; it has a brief account of Tuckney by W. D., i.e. William Dillingham [q. v.] 3. 'Eight Letters' (four by Tuckney) appended to Whichcote's 'Moral and Religious Aphorisms,' 1753, 8vo, edited by Samuel Salter [q. v.] with biographical prefaces.

[Account by W. D., 1670; Reliquiæ Baxterianæ, 1696, ii. 307, iii. 97; Calamy's Account, 1713, pp. 77 sq., 90; Calamy's Continuation, 1727, i. 114, 127 sq.; Preface by Salter, 1763; Granger's Biographical Hist. of England, 1779, iii. 305; Pishey Thompson's Hist. of Boston, 1856, pp. 80, 171, 187, 418; Baker's Hist. of St.

John's College (Mayor), 1869, i. 229 sq.; Tulloch's Rational Theology, 1872, ii. 47 sq.; Mitchell and Struthers's Minutes of the Westminster Assembly, 1874; Mayor's Admissions to St. John's College, 1882 i. 113, 1893 ii. 147; Harleian Society (1886), xxiii. 148; extract from baptismal register of Kirtton, per the Rev. Meyrick J. Sutton.] A. G.

TUDOR, EDMUND, EARL OF RICHMOND, known as EDMUND OF HADHAM (1430?-1456), father of Henry VII, eldest son of Owen Tudor [q. v.], by Henry V's widow, Catherine of Valois [q. v.], was born about 1430 at Hadham, Hertfordshire. Doubt attaches to the marriage of his parents. Jasper Tudor [q. v.] was a younger brother. When his mother retired to the abbey of Bermondsey in 1436, Edmund and his brothers were given into the charge of Catherine de la Pole, abbess of Barking. There they remained till 1440, when the abbess brought them to Henry VI's notice, and he gave them in charge of certain priests to be educated. When Edmund grew up Henry kept him at his court. He was knighted by Henry on 15 Dec. 1449, summoned to parliament as Earl of Richmond on 30 Jan. 1452-1453, and created Earl of Richmond and premier earl on 6 March 1452-3 (DOYLE; RAMSAY, Lanc. and York, ii. 152). In the parliament of 1453 he was formally declared legitimate. Henry made him large grants, particularly in 1454, and his name occurs as being exempt from the operation of acts of resumption. On 30 March 1453 he was appointed great forester of Braydon forest; he was also a member of the privy council. In 1454 his retinue at court consisted of a chaplain, two esquires, two yeomen, and two chamberlains.

In 1455, by the king's agency, he was married to the Lady Margaret Beaufort [q. v.], daughter of John Beaufort, duke of Somerset. She had been after Somerset's fall the ward of himself and his brother Jasper conjointly. Edmund died, on 8 Nov. 1456, at Carmarthen, and was buried in the Grey Friars there. His elegy was written by Lewis Glyn Cothi [see LNWs]. His remains were, at the dissolution of the monasteries in 1536, removed to the choir of St. David's Cathedral. By Margaret, his wife, he had one son Henry, afterwards Henry VII of England, born posthumously on 28 Jan. 1456-7.

[Williams's 'Penmynnedd and the Tudors' in Arch. Cambrensis, 3rd ser. xv. 394 &c.; Doyle's Official Baronage, iii. 118; Rot. Parl. v. 237 &c., vi. 228, 272; Letters of Margaret of Anjou (Camd. Soc.), xii. 103; Ramsay's Lancaster and York, i. 320, ii. 152 &c.; Strickland's Queens of England, Katharines of Valois; Cooper's Lady Margaret, ed. Mayor, pp. 4 &c.; Lords' Rep. on the Dignity of a Peer, iii. 213, iv. 493; G. E. O[okayne]'s Peerage, art. 'Richmond'; Gwaith Lewis Glyn Cothi, p. 492; Ordinances of the Privy Council, ed. Nicolas, vol. vi.] W. A. J. A.

TUDOR, JASPER, EARL OF PEMBROKE and DUKE OF BEDFORD, known as JASPER OF HATFIELD (1431?-1495), born about 1431 at Hatfield, was second son of Owen Tudor [q. v.] by Catherine of Valois [q. v.], widow of Henry V. He was, like his brother Edmund Tudor [q. v.], at first in the keeping of the abbess of Barking, and was, like him, subsequently educated by priests with some care. He was knighted by his half-brother, Henry VI, on 25 Dec. 1449. On 6 March 1453, or possibly earlier, he was created Earl of Pembroke, and soon afterwards he seems to have visited Norwich with Queen Margaret of Anjou. The Lancastrian king made him many grants, notably in 1454, and hence it is surprising that he was at first looked on as a Yorkist (cf. Ordinances of the Privy Council, vol. vi. p. liii). This may have been an error, or it may point to some jealousy on the part of the queen, to whom the Pembroke estates which Tudor had secured had been assigned in the first instance. However, when it came to fighting there was no doubt as to his opinions. He was present at the first battle of St. Albans (22 May 1455) on the king's side. Hereafterwards, at the meeting of parliament, took the oath to the king on 24 July 1455. His brother Edmund's widow, Margaret Tudor, was protected by him for some time after her husband's death in 1456, and it was at Jasper's residence, Pembroke Castle, that Henry, afterwards Henry VII, was born. He was occupied in Wales during 1457, and constructed some fortifications at Tenby (cf. Arch. Cambrensis, 5th ser. xiii. 177 &c.) He is noted as coming to the ill-fated parliament of Coventry in 1459 with 'a good flecheip.' He was appointed K.G. in April 1459.

In the early part of 1460 he engaged in the sieges of Denbigh, which he took later in the year. Margaret of Anjou joined him at Denbigh soon after the battle of Northampton (10 July). A letter from the council, dated 9 Aug. 1460, ordered him to give up Denbigh Castle to the Duke of York's deputy. Then next year (1461) he and the Earl of Wiltshire were defeated by Edward, duke of York (afterwards Edward IV), at the battle of Mortimer's Cross (2 Feb.), near Wigmore. He was reported taken, but seems to have joined Margaret. In the plans for the invasion of England which followed the battle of Towton (29 March), it was suggested that he should go to Wales and try to land at Beau-maris, a scheme which was not carried out, as he went first to Ireland in that year, and then in October was reported as 'flood and taken the mounteyns.' He took part in the invasion of the north of 1462, and was blockaded in Bambergh by Warwick's men. When most of the Lancastrians came to terms, he and Lord de Roos could not make any arrangement, and about Christmas 1462 they went to Scotland.

Jasper had been attainted (29 Dec. 1461), and probably joined Margaret's little court in Bar (cf. Archæological Journal, vol. vii.) In 1468, when a Lancastrian plot was discovered in England, he landed in North Wales (24 June). He took Denbigh, but could not reach Harlech, which was being besieged by William, Lord of North Wales (d. 1469) [q. v.]; and indeed, though he is said to have held sessions and assizes in Henry VI's name, he effected little, and was finally defeated by the Herberts and forced once more to fly abroad. The earldom of Pembroke was now given to William Herbert on 8 Sept. 1468, no doubt as a measure of security as well as of reward.

Jasper was with Warwick when he landed in Devonshire on 13 Sept. 1470. He was appointed joint-lieutenant for Henry VI, and the earldom of Pembroke was restored to him. On 30 Jan. 1470-1 he was made commissioner of array for South Wales and the marches, and on 14 Feb. following constable of Gloucester Castle. His duties and influence then lay in the west, and it is improbable that he was at the battle of Barnet on 14 April. He joined Margaret at Beaulieu, and then apparently went to gather fresh forces in Wales. He was too late to be of any service, and came up when the battle of Tewkesbury had been fought and lost on 4 May. One of the consequences of the revolution of 1470 had been the removal of the connection between Jasper Tudor and his nephew Henry, earl of Richmond. He had taken charge of young Henry when a little boy, and had seen to his education. Henry had fallen, however, into the hands of William Herbert, earl of Pembroke, at the capture of Harlech. Jasper Tudor in 1470 took charge of him once more, and presented him to Henry VI. Uncle and nephew were together when the fall of the Lancastrians made it necessary to fly, and Jasper Tudor took the youth first to Chepstow, where one Roger Vaughan nearly captured Jasper, thence to Pembroke, where they were besieged by Morgan ab Thomas, but were released the eighth day by Morgan's brother David (on these two brothers cf. Gwaith Lewis Glyn Cothi, p. 145), and thence to Tenby, where they took ship for the continent. A tradition relates that they were some time at Barmouth (cf. Arch. Cambrensis, 4th ser. ix. 58). It was by an accident of the weather that they landed in 1471 in Brittany, where they found a dangerous asylum for some years. On the restoration of Edward IV, Jasper was attainted again.

In Brittany, at the court of Francis II, Jasper shared the perils of young Henry, whom both Edward IV and Louis XI were anxious to get hold of. In the days of Richard III he was the adviser doubtless of his nephew, and one of the leading schemers in the many-headed outbreak of the autumn of 1483. They then sailed to the coast of Dorset or Devonshire, but arriving there about 12 Nov. or perhaps a little earlier, when all was over, they at once returned. Landing on the coast of Normandy, they passed to Brittany once more. At Rennes on Christmas-day 1483 the oath to Henry was taken by all his adherents.

The danger of the exiles now greatly increased, owing to the domestic politics of Brittany. The duke Francis was sinking into dotage, and his minister, Pierre de Landois, to secure Richard III's influence, consented to give up young Henry to the English king. Of this plan Christopher Urswick [q. v.] brought timely warning from Morton, and Jasper Tudor was sent first into France with some of the refugees, Henry following. They all reached Paris safely.

Jasper Tudor sailed with the little army of Lancastrians from Harfleur on 1 Aug. 1485, and landed at Dale in Milford Haven on 7 Aug. He was of peculiar importance owing to his influence as earl of Pembroke. Before the landing of the exiles Lewis Glyn Cothi had addressed poems to him which show the general expectation that was felt in Wales of Henry's arrival [see Lewis, J. 1450-1486]. The men of Pembroke at once sent an encouraging message. Jasper Tudor accompanied his nephew Henry to Bosworth and thence to London, where Henry became king. Jasper was now, 27 Oct. 1485, created Duke of Bedford and a privy councillor; he was on 11 Dec. 1485 restored to his earldom of Pembroke, and succeeded his old rival Herbert as chief justice of South Wales. He was also made for a time lieutenant of Calais, and had many grants from the king. From 11 March 1486 to 1 Nov. 1494 he was lord lieutenant of Ireland, but it does not appear that he ever went thither. Among other offices which he held were those of high steward of Oxford University in 1485, and earl marshal of England in 1492. Bedford took a prominent part in suppressing the Lovel and Stafford rebellion of 1486, advancing against the insurgents with a small army, and dispersing them not far from York. Again, in the Simnel insurrection, he was one of the commanders of Henry VII's forces, and helped to win the battle of Stoke on 16 June 1487. He took a leading place at the coronation of the queen in November 1487. On 14 July 1488 he was named one of the conservators of the truce with France, and is there spoken of as 'for the time being' lieutenant of Calais. He was one of the commanders of the army which invaded France in 1492. In 1495 the young Duke of York (afterwards Henry VIII) received the grant of the reversion to his estates.

Bedford died on 21 or 26 Dec. 1495, and, if his will was carried out, was buried in the abbey church of Keynsham, near Bristol, where he desired that four priests, for whom he left maintenance, should sing masses for his soul, and for those of his father and mother. His will is printed in 'Testamenta Vestusta,' p. 480. His autograph is extant in the British Museum Addit. MS. 21506, f. 10. He married, between 2 Nov. 1483 and 7 Nov. 1486, Catherine Woodville, youngest daughter of Richard, earl Rivers, and widow of Henry Stafford, second duke of Buckingham [q.v.], by whom he left no issue. His widow married Sir Richard Wingfield [q.v.] Bedford left an illegitimate daughter, Helen, who is said to have married William Gardiner, and to have been the mother of Stephen Gardiner [q.v.]

[G. E. Okayne's Peorage; Doyle's Official Baronage; Ramsay's Lancaster and York, vol. ii.; Busch's England under the Tudors; the poetical works of Lewis Glyn Cothi, which contain much information; Meyrick's Cardiganshire, p. cxxli; Letters of Margaret of Anjou (Camd. Soc.), xiii, 103; Rot. Parl. v. 237 &c., vi. 29 &c.; Trevelyan Papers (Camd. Soc.), i. 90, ii. 4, 52; Arrival of Edward IV (Camd. Soc.), pp. 24, 27, 44; Warkworth's Chron. (Camd. Soc.), pp. 12, 61; Polydore Vergil (Camd. Soc. transl.), pp. 109, &c.; Cartæ et Monumenta de Glamorgan, p. 405; Archæologia Cambrensis, 2nd ser. iv. 178, 4th ser. ix. 58, 5th ser. xii. 177 &c.; Cammies-Dupont, ii. 169; Waurin-Dupont, n. 264, iii. 186, 170, 176, 181; Paston Letters, ed. Gairdner, i. 264 &c., ii. 62 &c., iii. 17, 316; Brit. Mus. Egerton MS 2044, f. 1; Cal. Inquisitions Henry VII, pt. i. 1898, passim; authorities for family history given under TUDOR, OWEN.]

W. A. J. A.

TUDOR, MARGARET (1441-1509), mother of Henry VII. [See BEAUFORT, MARGARET.]

TUDOR, MARGARET (1489-1541), queen of James IV of Scotland. [See MARGARET.]

VOL. XIX.

TUDOR, OWEN (d. 1461), grandfather of Henry VII, belonged to a Welsh family of great antiquity (cf. especially the appendix to Wynne's edition of Powell's History of Wales, 1097, where Henry VII's descent is recorded). Its connection with Cadwaladr (d. 1172) [q.v.] is shadowy, but his pedigree is traced from Ednyfed Fychan, who was descended probably from Maredudd ap Cynan, and was a considerable personage at the court of Llewelyn ap Iorwerth (Williams's 'Pennydydd and the Tudors' in Archæologia Cambrensis, 3rd ser. xv. 282). Ednyfed lived chiefly at Tregarnedd in Anglesey, and from his second wife, Gwenllïan, daughter of Rhye, prince of South Wales, were descended the Tudors. His son Gronw was, by his wife Morfydd, the father of Tudor, afterwards called Tudor Hên. Tudor Hên lived in the days of Edward I, and refounded about 1299 the Dominican friary at Bangor (DUGDALE, Monasticon, vi. 1500; cf. Palmer, in the Reliquary, xxiv. 228). The Tudors were latterly supposed to have been rich, and they took no part in the Welsh rebellion in Edward I's reign.

Tudor Hên's grandson, Tudor Vychan ap Gronw (d. 1367?), is the subject of various traditions. He is said to have assumed knighthood, and then to have received it at the hands of Edward III. He is described as of Trece Castell, one of his manors. He left a family by a wife Margaret, daughter of Thomas ap Llewelyn ap Owen, and of these Gronw Fychan (d. 1382), the forester of Snowdon, who was drowned, was the favourite of the Black Prince, and after his death was appointed (probably in reversion) in 1381 constable of Beaumaris Castle, with a salary of forty marks. By his wife Mevanwy he was the father of a son Tudor whose descendants formed a branch of the family which lasted some hundreds of years. Other sons of Sir Tudor Vychan ap Gronw were Rhys and William ap Tudor, who were captains of archers in the service of Richard II.

The fourth son, Meredydd, father of the subject of this article, was escheator of Anglesey in 1392, and held some office under the bishop of Bangor, that of scutifer, or butler, or steward. His wife was Margaret, daughter of Dafydd Fychan ap Dafydd Llwyd. It has been said that Meredydd killed a man, was outlawed, and fled to Snowdon with his wife, and that there Owen Tudor was born; but it seems more likely that Meredydd fled alone, and that Owen was born about the beginning of the fifteenth century in his absence. Meredydd was cousin through his mother to Owen Glendower, whom the Tudors seem to have actively supported (cf.

WYLLI, Henry IV, esp. i. 215-16, ii. 15). Glendower's son entered the service of Henry V, and doubtless it was in this way that Owen Tudor came to the court. It is said that he was present as one of the Welsh band at Agincourt, and distinguished himself so much that he was rewarded by being made one of the esquires of the body to the king; but he seems to have been rather young for such a post at the time. He certainly stayed about the court, and early in the reign of Henry VI he attracted the notice of Catherine, widow of Henry V [see CATHERINE OF VALENS], who appointed him clerk of her wardrobe. Tudor and the widowed queen soon lived together as man and wife. If Sir James Ramsay is right, she had wished to marry Edmund Beaufort, but was prevented by Gloucester for personal reasons. At what time exactly the union with Owen Tudor took place, and whether it was a legal marriage, it is difficult to determine. The act which was passed in 1427-8 making it a serious offence to marry a queen-dowager without the consent of the king is evidence that nothing was then known of the matter, at all events publicly; while, as Mr. Williams points out, the birth of the children can hardly have been concealed. It may be assumed, then, that the union took place about 1429.

In 1436, perhaps through Gloucester's influence, Tudor's children were taken from the queen, and she was confined in, or voluntarily retired to, Bermondsey Abbey. At the same date Owen Tudor was confined in Newgate, whence he escaped by the aid of his priest and servant. On the death of Catherine in Bermondsey Abbey on 8 Jan. 1436-7, Henry VI 'desired and willed that on Oweyn Tidir the which dwolled wt the said Quene should come to his presence.' He was at Daventry in Warwickshire at the time, and refused to come without a written safe-conduct, and when he did get within reach he judged it prudent to take sanctuary at Westminster. There he remained some time in spite of efforts to entrap him by getting him to disport himself in a tavern at Westminster Gate. At last he came before the council and defended his cause. He was allowed to go back to Wales, and then, in violation of the safe-conduct, he was brought back again by Lord Beaumont and given in charge to the Earl of Suffolk at Wallingford; later he was moved to Newgate. He, his priest, and his servant, however, managed to get free once more, and Owen Tudor retired to North Wales. The persecution of Owen Tudor was in no way due to Henry VI's personal action, and when he came of age he allowed Owen Tudor an annuity, and was very kind to his sons.

Owen Tudor proved a faithful Lancastrian. Just before the battle of Northampton (10 July 1400) Henry made him keeper of the parks at Denbigh. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Mortimer's Cross (4 Feb. 1460-1), and by the order of young Edward he was beheaded in the market-place of Horsford. His head was put on the market cross, and a woman, whom a contemporary calls mad, had the hair combed and the face washed, and set round many lighted candles. His body was buried in a chapel of the church of the Grey Friars at Hereford.

By Queen Catherine, Owen Tudor had three sons, of whom Edmund and Jasper are separately noticed; and a third became a monk at Westminster. Tudor also left two daughters by Queen Catherine, of whom one became a nun, and the other, Jacina, is said to have married Reginald, lord Gray de Wilton. A natural son of Owen, called Dafydd, is said to have been knighted by Henry VII, who gave him in marriage Mary, daughter and heiress of John Bohun of Midhurst in Sussex.

[Williams's Pennymnedd and the Tudors in Archæologia Cambriensis, 1st ser. iv. 267, 3rd ser. xv. 278, 379; Sandford's Gen. Hist. pp. 278, &c.; Strickland's Queens of England, Catherine of Valois in vol. i.; Ramsey's Lancaster and York, i. 496, ii. 243, 269; Polydore Vergil's Hist. Angl. pp. 487-8; Bernard Andreas in Memorials of Henry VII (Rolls Ser.), pp. 9-10; Ordinances of the Privy Council, ed. Nicolas, v. pp. xvi-xix, 47, 48, 49; Coll. of Lond. Cit. (Camd. Soc.), p. 211; Dynw. the Llandilo Visitations of Wales, esp. ii. 108; Cambrian Register, i. 149; Brit. Mus. Egerton MS. 2587, f. 13 b; Pennant's Tours, ed. Rhys, iii. 44 sqq.] W. A. J. A.

TUDWAY, THOMAS (d. 1728), musician, was born probably before 1660, as he became a choirboy in the Chapel Royal very soon after the Restoration, and on 22 April 1684 obtained a tenor's place in the choir of St. George's, Windsor. In 1670 he succeeded Henry Loosmore [q. v.] as organist of King's College, Cambridge, and acted as instructor of the choristers from Christmas 1679 to midsummer 1680. He also became organist at Pembroke College and the university church, Great St. Mary's. In 1681 he graduated Mus. Bac., composing as his exercises the twentieth Psalm in English and the second Psalm in Latin, both with orchestral accompaniment. After the death in 1700 of Nicholas Staggin [q. v.], the first professor of music at Cambridge, Tudway was chosen as his successor on 30 Jan. 1704-5. He then proceeded to the degree of Mus. Doc.; his exercise and anthem, 'Thou, O God, hast heard our desire,' was performed in King's College Chapel on 16 April, on the occasion of Queen Anne's visit to the university. The autograph is at the Royal College of Music. Tudway's anthem, 'Is it true that God will dwell with men?' had been performed in St. George's, Windsor, at the queen's first attendance there; and he had composed a thanksgiving anthem, 'I will sing of Thy great mercies,' for the victory of Blenheim. He was nominated composer and organist extraordinary to the queen. This honorary office did not prevent him from exercising, at the queen's expense, his usual practice of punning. On 28 July 1700 for an offence of this nature he was sentenced to be 'degraded from all degrees, taken and to be taken,' and was deprived of his professorship and his three organists' posts. On 10 March 1706-7 he publicly made submission and a retraction in the Regent House. He was then formally absolved and reinstated in all his appointments (Bennet's 'Register of Emmanuel College,' p. 260, in Ilist. MSS. Comm. 4th Rep. p. 419 b). This episode has been wrongly attributed to the irritation produced by a pun of Tudway's upon the Duke of Somerset's restricted bestowal of patronage upon the members of the university: 'The Chancellor rides us all, without a bit in our mouths;' but this must have been at a later date. Tudway was one of the subscribers to Walker's 'Sufferings of the Clergy,' and writes bitterly of Dr. Bentley. His strong tory opinions may have brought him into connection with the Earl of Oxford, at whose desire he engaged in the work which has brought him lasting fame. As an addition to the Harleian Library, Tudway undertook in 1714 to copy a representative set of compositions for the Anglican church, then quite unattainable in score. He had planned three quarto volumes, to contain respectively works composed before the civil war, works of the Restoration period, and works by composers then living; but his materials accumulated until he completed six volumes, more than three thousand pages. He formed a close friendship with the earl's librarian, Humphrey Wanley [q. v.], and was in active correspondence with him during the next four years, giving full details of his labours. On 27 July 1718 he wrote that the last volume was begun. Thirty guineas a volume was paid him. The six volumes form Harleian MSS. 7337-42. They contain 70 services and 244 anthems by 85 composers; 19 anthems and a service were by himself. He obtained materials from the manuscripts at Durham, Eton, Exeter, Oxford, Wells, Westminster, Windsor, York, and the Chapel Royal; but the collection was principally founded on the old choir-books at Ely. He began with Tallis's Dorian service and concluded with Handel's Utrecht Te Deum and Jubilate. The selection is all that could be desired as regards the works of the Restoration school; there are fewer examples of the Elizabethan and Jacobean polyphonists, but all the finest works are inserted. He recommended that a copy of Tallis's motet for forty voices, belonging to James Hawkins of Ely, should also be purchased. Each of the six volumes is prefaced by an essay, the last being an attempt at a history of music; it is of little value, except for Tudway's personal recollections, which are unfortunately often inaccurate. The collection is a splendid monument of Tudway's taste and industry; and from the time of Hawkins and Burney it has been continually consulted, though very many pieces have since been printed. A detailed list of the contents, arranged alphabetically, is in the catalogue of the manuscript music in the British Museum (1842); and another, in accordance with Tudway's own arrangement, in Grove's 'Dictionary of Music and Musicians,' iv. 198.

In 1720 Tudway composed anthems and a Te Deum with orchestral accompaniment for the consecration of Lord Oxford's private chapel at Wimpole, adding a Jubilate in 1721. He wrote to Wanley on 11 July 1718 that as there was no one to present two young men who were to take their degrees in music, 'the vice-chancellor and heads came to a resolution that I should be created that I might do it in form, which I was on Thursday in the commencement week, and the next week I presented them in the Professor of Physick's Robes, pro hac vice, as Professor of Music.' What he was 'created' on this occasion is not clear; it is possible that the appointment in 1706 had been informal, the post being then purely honorary. He died on 23 Nov. 1726, and was succeeded as professor by Maurice Greene [q. v.] in July 1730. His personality and his puns were long remembered at Cambridge, as both Hawkins and Burney found nearly half a century later. Hawkins stated that after resigning his posts he lived in London, and wrote his collection; the latter assertion is obviously a mistake, and probably the former also. Hawkins also gave an account of Tudway's being introduced to a club of which Prior, Sir James Thornhill [q. v.], and others were members. Thornhill drew in pencil the portrait of each member, among them Tudway playing the harpsichord, and Prior wrote verses beneath. The drawings were in the collection of West, president of the Royal Society. A portrait of Tudway in his doctor's robes, and holding his exercise for the degree, is at the music school, Oxford.

Some songs and catches of his were published in various collections. A birthday ode for Queen Anne (in Brit. Mus. Addit. MS. 17285) and the Te Deum and Jubilate for Wimpole were the most important of his compositions; but none had lasting value. The anthem, 'Thou, O Lord, hast heard our desire,' was printed by Arnold. An interesting letter from Tudway to his son, describing the musical resources employed during his early life, and afterwards totally forgotten, was quoted by Hawkins.

[Tudway's letters to Wanley, formerly in Harleian MS. 3779, now in 3782; Wanley's diary in Lansdowne MSS. 771-2; Boyer's Political State of Great Britain, xxxii, 614; Historical Register, 1726, Chronological Diary, p. 43; Luard's Grad. Cantabr. p. 479, and App. p. 26; Hawkins's History of Music, ch. 144 n. and 167; Burney's History of Music, iii. 457-9; Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ii. 437, iv. 185; Ouseley in Neumann's Illustrirte Geschichte der Musik, English edit. p. 730; Catalogue of the Sacred Harmonic Society's Library; Davey's History of English Music, pp. 343-6, 369.] H. D.

TUFNELL, HENRY (1805-1854), politician, born at Chichester in 1805, was the elder son of William Tufnell of Chichester (1769-1809), by his wife Mary (d. 1829), daughter and coheiress of Lough Carleton. Henry was educated at Eton, and, proceeding to Christ Church, Oxford, matriculated on 21 May 1825, graduating B.A. in 1829. On 27 April 1827 he became a student at Lincoln's Inn. In 1831, when Sir Robert John Wilmot-Horton [q. v.] was appointed governor of Ceylon, Tufnell accompanied him as his private secretary, and, returning home about 1835, he became private secretary to Gilbert Elliot, second earl of Minto [q. v.], first lord of the admiralty. Under Lord Melbourne's administration, from April 1835 to September 1840 he was one of the lords of the treasury, and on 27 July 1837 he was returned to parliament in the whig interest as member for Ipswich, but was unseated on petition on 26 Feb. 1838. On 24 Jan. 1840 he was returned for Devonport, and retained his seat until within a few months of his death. On the formation of Lord John Russell's government in July 1846 Tufnell became secretary to the treasury; but in July 1850 the infirmity of his health compelled him to resign office. He died on 15 June 1854 at Catton Hall, Derbyshire. He was thrice married. In 1830 he married Anne Augusta (d. 1848), daughter of Sir Robert John Wilmot-Horton. In 1844 he married Frances (d. 1846), second daughter of Sir John Byng, first earl of Strathford [q. v.], by whom he had a daughter. In 1848 he married, as his third wife, Anne, second daughter of Archibald John Primrose, fourth earl of Rosobery [q. v.]; by her he had a son Henry.

In 1830, in conjunction with Sir George Cornwall Lewis [q. v.], Tufnell translated Karl Otfried Muller's 'History and Antiquities of the Doric Race' (Oxford, 8vo).

[Gent. Mag. 1854, ii. 299; Times, 17 June 1854; Foster's Alumni Oxon. 1715-1886; Records of Lincoln's Inn, 1896, ii. 123; Official Returns of Members of Parliament.] E. I. C.

TUFNELL, THOMAS JOLLIFFE (1819-1885), surgeon, fifth son of John Charles Tufnell, lieutenant-colonel of the Middlesex militia, by his wife Uliana Ivaniona, only daughter of John Powell, rector of Bishopsbourne, Kent, was born at Lackham House, near Chippenham, Wiltshire, on 28 May 1819. He was educated at Dr. Radcliffe's school at Salisbury, and was apprenticed in 1836 to Samuel Lescombe of Exeter, then senior surgeon to the Devon and Exeter Hospital. Tufnell proceeded to London after studying at Exeter for three years, and entered at St. George's Hospital under Sir Benjamin Collins Brodie (1783-1862) [q. v.] and Caesar Hawkins. He was admitted a member of the College of Surgeons of England in May 1841, and on 11 June in the same year he entered the army as assistant surgeon to the 44th regiment, then serving in India. He proceeded to Calcutta, and took medical charge of all the troops as they arrived from England, remaining for this purpose at Chinsurah until the last detachment had landed at Christmas. By this delay he was hindered from participating in the disastrous campaign in Afghanistan in 1842, in which the 44th regiment was almost annihilated. He returned to England in October, and was posted to the 3rd dragoon guards, with whom he served at Dundalk, Dublin, and Cork. In 1844 he was married, and determined to leave the service and settle in private practice. On 11 April 1846 he accordingly obtained his transfer to the army medical staff at Dublin, and shortly afterwards accepted as a life appointment the post of surgeon to the Dublin district military prison. He was admitted in 1846 the first fellow by examination of the Royal College of Surgeons of Ireland, and in 1846 he fitted up a class-room and lectured on military hygiene. He also lectured upon this subject at the St. Vincent and Bagot Street hospitals until his appointment as regius professor of military surgery in the College of Surgeons in 1851. He lectured in this capacity until 1860, when the chair was abolished by the government as a result of the foundation of the Netley military school. Tufnell again saw service; for in the war between Russia and Turkey, after passing down the Danube in 1854, he went to the Crimea with a Scottish regiment. He acted as an examiner in surgery at the Royal College of Surgeons in Ireland, but he resigned the post on becoming a candidate for the office of vice-president in 1873. He served the college as president in 1874-5, and he was for more than twenty years surgeon to the City of Dublin Hospital. He died on 27 Nov. 1885, and is buried in Mount Jerome cemetery, near Dublin. In 1844 he was married to Henrietta, daughter of Crossdale Molony of Granahan, and widow of Robert Fanning. By her he left two daughters: Iva, married to Peter Leslie Peacocke; and Florence, married to Thomas Turbitt of Owenston.

Tufnell wrote: 1. 'Practical Remarks on the Treatment of Aneurism,' Dublin, 1851, 8vo. 2. 'The Successful Treatment of Internal Aneurism,' London, 1864, 8vo; 2nd edit. 1875. He also devised various surgical instruments.

[Biographical notice in Sir Charles Cameron's History of the Royal College of Surgeons in Ireland, 1886, p. 422; obituary notices in the British Medical Journal, 1885, ii. 1088, and in the Trans. Royal Medical and Chirurg. Soc. 1886, lix. 18; Burke's Landed Gentry, 1898.]

D.A. P.

TUFTON, SACKVILLE, ninth EARL OF THANET (1767-1826), was born at Hothfield House in Kent on 30 June 1767. His ancestor Nicholas, son of Sir John Tufton, bart., of a family sprung from Northiam in Sussex, but long established in Kent, had been created first Earl of Thanet on 25 Aug. 1628. The first earl's youngest brother, William, was created a baronet of Ireland in 1622. When the rival claims of the Earls of Carlisle and Pembroke to the island of Barbados were settled in the former's favour in April 1629, Sir William Tufton was appointed governor (the fifth since the settlement) in 1625). He arrived at Barbados with some two hundred colonists on 21 Dec. 1629, but was superseded next June by Captain Henry Hawley, against whose appointment he drew up a memorial. Much incensed at this step, Hawley nominated a fresh council, before which Tufton was arraigned for high treason, condemned, and shot in May 1631 (see SCHOMBERG, Hist.

of Barbadoes, 1818, pp. 264-5). No fewer than fifty members of the family lie interred in the Tufton chapel in Rainham church, Kent, conspicuous among them Nicholas, third earl of Thanet (1631-1679), a liberal contributor to the royalist funds, who upon returning to England in 1655, after a long period of travel abroad, was committed (on a charge of conspiracy against the Protector) to the Tower, and detained, with a short interval, until 25 June 1658 (see Clarendon State Papers, 1876, ii. 303 seq.; Masson, Milton, ii. 47). The family compounded with the parliamentary sequestrators during the rebellion for the enormous sum of 9,000*l.*, and, in consequence of these and other hardships borne in the royalist cause, they adopted from this time their motto of 'Fiel pero desdichado' (see Cal. Proc. Comm. for Compounding, 1890, pp. 839, 840).

The ninth earl bore the same names as his grandfather and father, respectively seventh and eighth earls of Thanet. His mother was Mary, daughter of Lord John Philip Sackville, and upon his father's death, on 10 April 1786, his maternal uncle, John Frederick Sackville, third duke of Dorset [q. v.], acted as his guardian during his minority. In early life he spent much time abroad, especially in Vienna, where he formed an alliance with an Hungarian lady, Anne Charlotte de Bojanowitz, to whom he was married, under the Anglican rite, at St. George's, Hanover Square, on 28 Feb. 1811. Some light would appear to be thrown upon their intimacy in a letter from William Windham, dated 'Paris, 15 Sept. 1791: 'Thanet has arrived here 'with a Hungarian lady whom as a brilliant achievement he carried off from her husband at Vienna' (Diary, ed. Baring, 1803, p. 237).

Thanet took no prominent part in politics, but generally supported the Duke of Bedford and the opposition to Pitt. In May 1798 he was present with Fox, Sheridan, Erskine, and other whig sympathisers at the trial of Arthur O'Connor [q. v.] at Maidstone. O'Connor was found not guilty, but was not thereupon discharged, as a warrant for his arrest for another offence was pending. Thanet and others were charged with having created a riot in the court and put out the lights in an attempt to rescue the prisoner, or at least to facilitate his escape. The case was tried before Lord Kenyon at the king's bench on 25 April 1799. Sir John Scott (afterwards Lord Eldon) prosecuted, and Erskine conducted the defence. R. B. Sheridan appeared to give evidence for the accused, and distinguished himself by parrying eight times, and finally evading, the question of Edward Law (afterwards Lord Ellenborough), counsel for the prosecution, 'Do you believe Lord Thanet meant to favour the escape of O'Connor?' Having been found guilty of riot and assault at Maidstone, Thanet was brought up for judgment on 8 May, and committed to the king's bench prison, the bail offered by the Duke of Bedford being refused. On 10 June he was sentenced to a year's imprisonment in the Tower and a fine of 1,000*l.*, and on his release he was ordered to give security for his good behaviour for seven years in surties to the amount of 20,000*l.* The sentence was excessively severe, if not unjust, for Thanet certainly had no deliberate intention of aiding O'Connor's rescue. After his release he earl lived quietly at Hothfield, and became a popular agriculturist, regularly visiting the stock market at Ashford, and conversing with the graziers. Latterly he spent much time abroad, and he died at Chalons on 24 Jan. 1825. He was buried on 7 Feb. at Rainham. Leaving no issue, he was succeeded in turn by his brothers Charles (1770-1832) and Henry Tufton (1775-1849), eleventh and last earl of Thanet.

[Ann. Register, 1700, passim, and 1825, Chron. p. 221; Pocock's Memorials of the Family of Tufton, Gravesend, 1800; Addit. MSS. 20553-20570, and 34020 f. 40; Berry's Kent Genealogies, p. 352; Hasted's Kent, ii. 224, 438, iii. 253; Archaeologia Cantiana, xvii. 50 seq.; Brydges's Poemage, iii. 435; G. E. Cokayne's Complete Peerage; Burke's Extinct Peerage and Baronetage; Cobbett's State Trials, &c. 1700. See also The whole Proceedings . . . against the Rt. Hon. Sackville, Earl of Thanet, and others, 1790, by Robert Outlar Ferguson [q. v.], and William Firth's Thanet's Case considered, London, 1802.] T. S.

DUKE, SIR BRIAN (d. 1545), secretary to Henry VIII, was apparently son of Richard Tuke (d. 1498?) and Agnes his wife, daughter of John Bland of Nottinghamshire (Essex Pedigree, Harl. Soc. xiv. 609; Visit. of Notts.) The family, whose name is variously spelt Tuko, Toke, and Tooke, was settled in Kent, and Sir Brian's father or grandfather, also named Richard, is said to have been tutor to Thomas Howard, second duke of Norfolk [q. v.] Possibly it was through Norfolk's influence that Brian Tuke was introduced at court; in 1508 he was appointed king's bailiff of Sandwich, and in 1509 he was clerk of the signet. On 30 July in the same year he was made feodary of Wallingford and St. Walric, and on 28 Oct. 1510 was appointed clerk of the council at Calais. On 20 Dec. 1512 he was placed on the commission of the peace for Kent, and on 28 Nov. 1513 on that for Essex. In 1516 he was made a knight of the king's body, and in 1517 'governor of the king's posts' (for Tuke's account of the organisation of the postal service, see State Papers, Henry VIII, i. 401-6). For some time Tuke was secretary to Wolsey, and in 1522 he was promoted to be French secretary to the king; an enormous amount of correspondence passed through his hands, and there are more than six hundred references to him in the fourth volume alone of Brewer's 'Letters and Papers of Henry VIII.' On 17 April 1523 Tuke was granted the clerkship of parliament surrendered by John Taylor (d. 1534) [q. v.] In 1528 he was one of the commissioners appointed to treat for peace with France, and in the same year was made treasurer of the household. In February 1530-1 Edward North (afterwards first Baron North) [q. v.] was associated with him in the clerkship of parliaments, and in 1533 Tuke served as sheriff of Essex and Hertfordshire. Among the numerous grants with which his services were rewarded Tuke received the manors of Southwold, Layer Marney, Thorpo, and East Lee in Essex. He performed his official duties to the king's satisfaction, avoided all pretence to political independence, and retained his posts until his death at Layer Marney on 26 Oct. 1545. He was buried with his wife in St. Margaret's, Lothbury.

Tuke married Crissell, daughter of Nicholas Boughton of Woolwich, and by her, who died on 28 Dec. 1538, had issue three sons and three daughters. The eldest son, Maximilian, predeceased him; the second, Charles, died soon after him, and the property devolved on the third, George Tuke, who was sheriff of Essex in 1567. Of the daughters, the eldest, Elizabeth, married George, ninth or eighteenth baron Audley; and the second, Mary, married Sir Reginald Scott of Scott's Hall, Kent [son under Scott, SIR WILLIAM, d. 1350].

No fewer than six portraits of Tuke are ascribed to Holbein, whose salary it was Tuke's business to pay. One is in the old Pinacothek at Munich; another belongs to Lord Mothun, and is at Corsham Court; a third belonged in 1809 to Mr. W. M. Tuke of Salford Walden; a fourth to the Dukes of Westminster (cf. Cat. Third Loan Exhib. No. 625); and a fifth to Mr. John Leslie Toke of Godinton Park, Kent (Athenaeum, 1869, ii. 376, 408, 442); a sixth belonged to Mr. J. R. Haig (Notes and Queries, 4th ser. v. 813). One of these belonged to Lord Lisle, son of the Earl of Leicester, in 1678 ( Evelyn's Diary, 27 Aug. 1678).

Tuke was a patron of learning as well as of art; Leland speaks of his eloquence, and celebrates his praises in nine Latin poems (Encomia, pp. 4, 15, 22, 31, 34, 38, 40, 47, 77). He wrote the preface to Thynne's edition of Chaucer published in 1532 [see THYNNE, WILLIAM]. He is said to have written against Polydore Vergil [q. v.], and to have been one of the authors from whom Holinshed derived his facts; probably the latter reference is merely to Tuke's numerous letters and state papers, many of which, extant among the Cottonian manuscripts and in the Record Office, have been calendared in Brewer and Gairdner's 'Letters and Papers of Henry VIII.'

[State Papers, Henry VIII, passim, Cotton. MSS.; Letters and Papers of Henry VIII; Ellis's Original Letters, 4th ser. ii. 270; Acts of the Privy Council, ed. Nicolas, vol. vii. and ed. Dasent, vol. i.; Stow's Survey, Rymer's Fœdera; Bale's Cat. Scriptt. III.; Tanner's Bibl. Brit.-Hib.; Morant's Essex, i. 117, 118, 407; Nichols's Lit. Anecdotes, ix. 163-4; Gent. Mag. 1831, i. 585; Notes and Queries, 4th ser. iv. 313, 489, v. 24, 77, 266, 313, 517; Brewer's Henry VIII, i. 66, ii. 272, 276, 370.] A. F. F.

DUKE, DANIEL HACK (1827-1895), physician, born at York on 19 April 1827, was youngest son of Samuel Tuke [q. v.] and Priscilla Hack of Chichester. James Hack Tuke [q. v.] was his elder brother. His twin-brother died on the day he was born. Tuke's delicacy of constitution retarded his education. Although he gave evidence of scholarly and literary habits, he does not seem to have owed much to his teachers. He learned to read and write English well, but acquired little Latin and less Greek. About the beginning of 1845 he was articled to a solicitor at Bradford, but, finding himself in uncongenial surroundings and in impaired health, he retired from the law in order to devote himself to the study of philosophy and poetry. His first publication was an essay on capital punishment, in which he urged the abolition of the extreme penalty of the law; but in later life his opinion on this point was modified. He experienced as a young man religious difficulties in connection with the progress of geological science; but, while he continued to the end of his life profoundly religious, he was naturally averse from all dogmatic statements, and tried every assertion in the light of his critical judgment.

In 1847 Tuke entered the service of the York Retreat, an institution which owed much to his family. He devoted his spare time to the study of the patients under his care during two years' residence among them, and he studied the literature of insanity. In 1850 he entered as a student at St. Bartholomew's Hospital, London, and gained several prizes. Two years later he became a member of the Royal College of Surgeons, and in 1853 obtained the degree of M.D. of the university of Heidelberg. Next year he gained the prize offered by the Association for Improving the Condition of the Insane for an essay published in 1854 'On the Progressive Changes in the Moral Management of the Insane.' This in some measure followed up his father's book on the 'Retreat,' and struck the keynote of his subsequent literary work. In 1858, with (Sir) J. C. Rucknill, he produced a classical work entitled 'A Manual of Psychological Medicine,' which kept its place for many years as a standard treatise (other editions followed in 1862, 1874, and 1879). In the first half of the volume—on lunacy law, classification, causation, and the various forms of insanity—Tuke showed that a new era had begun in the scientific study of insanity.

After his marriage in the autumn of 1858 Tuke set out on the first of many continental tours. He continued to visit foreign asylums and to record his observations until the end of his life. On returning to York from his first tour, he entered on the practice of his profession, and became visiting physician to the Retreat and to the York Dispensary, while he lectured on mental diseases at the York School of Medicine. But in 1859 acute symptoms of pulmonary phthisis declared themselves, and Tuke soon retired to Falmouth, where he resided for a period of fifteen years.

In 1875 his health permitted of his entering on practice as a consulting physician in mental diseases in London, where he remained to the end. He also served the university of London as examiner in mental philosophy, was governor of Bethlehem Royal Hospital, lecturer on mental diseases in Charing Cross Hospital, and one of the founders of the After-care Association, which takes charge of the poorer class of convalescents from insanity. In 1880 he became joint editor of the 'Journal of Mental Science.' To that journal, to 'Brain,' and to other periodicals he contributed many papers. His services were recognised by his colleagues by his appointment to the presidential chair of the Medico-Psychological Association in 1881, while the university of Glasgow conferred on him the degree of LL.D. in 1883.

One of the chief results of Tuke's prolonged investigation into the condition of the insane in foreign countries was a book on the insane in the United States and Canada, which appeared in 1885. His visit to Canada called forth a strong remonstrance against the methods of treatment in vogue in certain asylums of the province of Quebec, and vast improvements followed. Tuke died on 5 March 1895, after a very brief illness ushered in by apoplexy, and was buried in the Friends' ground at Saffron Walden. He married, on 10 Aug. 1853, Esther Maria Stioknoy of Ridgmont, Holderness, Yorkshire. Mr. H. S. Tuke, A.R.A., is his son.

Tuke was a prolific and suggestive writer, and was encyclopædic in his knowledge of lunacy. Besides those already mentioned, his chief works were: 1. 'Illustrations of the Influence of the Mind on the Body,' 1872 (2nd edit. 1884, and French translation 1886). 2. 'Insanity in Ancient and Modern Life, with chapters on Prevention,' 1878. 3. 'History of the Insane in the British Isles,' 1882, which was the outcome of long and exhaustive study. 4. 'Sleep-walking and Hypnotism,' 1884. 5. 'Past and Present Provision for the Insane Poor in Yorkshire,' 1889. 6. 'Prichard and Symonds in especial relation to Mental Disease, with a Chapter on Moral Insanity,' 1891. 7. 'Dictionary of Psychological Medicine,' 1892, which summarises our knowledge of insanity in its varied forms, and is the authoritative English work on the subject at the present time.

A portrait appeared in the 'Journal of Mental Science,' 1895.

[Obituary notice in Journal of Mental Science by Dr. W. W. Ireland, 1895; personal knowledge.] A. R. U.

TUKE, HENRY (1755-1811), Quaker writer, son of William Tuko [q. v.], by his first wife, Elizabeth, daughter of John Hoyal of Woodhouse, Yorkshire, was born at York on 24 Jan. 1755. The loss of his mother in early childhood was supplied by an affectionate stepmother, Esther Tuke, original founder of the now extensive Friends' Girl School at York.

He was educated at Sowerby, Yorkshire, and upon the death of the master, while only fifteen, superintended the school for a short time for the benefit of Mrs. Ellorby, the widow. Continuing his classical and other studies, Tuko then joined his father in business in York, where he spent the remainder of his life, becoming a minister of the Society of Friends in his twenty-fifth year, shortly before his marriage. He paid some ministerial visits to all parts of the British Isles, and was concerned in promoting the discipline of the society, the abolition of slavery, and the success of the British and Foreign Bible Society. He died on 11 Aug. 1814, and was buried on the 10th at the Friends' burial-ground at York. By his wife Mary Maria Scott, whom he married in 1781, he had, with others, a son Samuel Tuke [q. v.], father of Daniel Hack Tuke and James Hack Tuke, both separately noticed.

A sketch-portrait of him hangs at Devonshire House, Bishopsgate Street.

Tuke wrote largely for the young, and his books have gone through many editions and been translated into several languages. The chief are: 1. 'The Faith of the People called Quakers,' 1801, 8vo; 3rd edit. 1812. 2. 'The Principles of Religion as professed by the Society of Christians usually called Quakers,' 1805, 12mo; 12th edit. 1852; translated into German, 1818, and in 1847; into French, London, 1823, 1851; into Danish, Stavanger, 1854, 12mo; and also translated in an abridged form into Spanish. 3. 'The Duties of Religion and Morality as inculcated in the Holy Scriptures,' York, 1808, 12mo; 4th edit. 1812. 4. 'Select Passages from the Holy Scriptures,' York, 1809, 16mo; 3rd edit. 1814, 12mo. 5. 'Biographical Notices of Members of the Society of Friends,' vol. i. containing 'Life of George Fox,' York, 1813, reprinted with a supplement, 1826, 12mo, translated into French, 'La Vie de George Fox, avec un Supplément,' Guerusey and London, 1824; vol. ii. York, 1815, 2nd edit. 1826.

'The Works,' to which is prefixed a biographical sketch of the author by Lindley Murray, 4 vols. York, 1815, 12mo, do not contain a complete collection. Numerous portions of the above were issued separately by the Friends' Tract Association.

[Biogr. Sketch, by Lindley Murray; Biogr. Cat. of Portraits at Devonshire House, p. 673; Smith's Cat. of Friends' Books; Registers at Devonshire House; information from W. Murray Tuko, esq.] C. F. S.

TUKE, JAMES HACK (1819-1896), philanthropist, was born at York on 13 Sept. 1819. He was a son of Samuel Tuke [q. v.], grandson of Henry Tuke [q. v.], and great-grandson of William Tuko [q. v.], men who took an active part in public life and in the affairs of the Society of Friends. Daniel Hack Tuke [q. v.], mental specialist, was his younger brother.

James was educated at the Friends' school in York, and in 1835 entered his father's wholesale tea and coffee business in that city. There he remained until 1852, when, on becoming a partner in the banking firm of Sharples & Co., he removed to Hitchin, Hertfordshire, which from that time became his

During his early life at York he devoted constant thought to educational and kindred subjects, as well as to the management of the Friends' asylum known as 'The Retreat,' which his great-grandfather had been largely instrumental in establishing. He read much. Natural history interested him specially; and, in conjunction with his brother William, he devoted considerable attention to the study of ornithology. Many interesting observations made by the brothers are recorded in Hewitson's 'Eggs of British Birds.' In 1842 Tuke purchased for 5*l.* an egg of the great auk, which sold in 1896 for 160*l.* In the autumn of 1845 he accompanied William Forster (1784-1854) [q. v.] and Joseph Crosfield on a tour in the United States, undertaken for rest and change. During this journey he visited all the asylums for the insane that came within his reach, and noted his observations on them for the benefit of his father and others interested in 'The Retreat.' He also, in 1846 and 1853, read before the Friends' Educational Society papers (afterwards published) on the 'Free Schools' and 'Educational Institutions' of the United States.

Throughout his life he devoted whatever leisure he had from business to public objects. He worked on nearly all the important committees of Friends' associations, schools, &c., assisted in founding others, was treasurer for eighteen years of the Friends' Foreign Mission Association, and chairman for eight years of the Friends' Central Education Board. His sympathies were wide, and he supported all kinds of charitable institutions.

Tuke was one of the first to enter Paris after its evacuation by the Germans in 1871. He, with other Friends, had undertaken to distribute 20,000*l.*, subscribed by English quakers for the relief of those whose property around the city had been destroyed during the siege. Their work was nearly completed when the revolution of the 'Commune' broke out. The 'permit,' issued a few days before, signed 'Jules Ferry, Maire de Paris,' was no longer of use. Application was therefore made to the 'Comité Centrale,' and a free pass, signed by 'Fortune Henry,' was issued to 'Oliver James Black Tuke.' They then finished their work and left Paris, after braving the dangers of the revolution for five days. Of this experience Tuke published a brief account (London and Hitchin, demy 8vo, 1871). In 1879 he published 'A Sketch of the Life of John Fothergill, M.D., F.R.S.,' the founder of Ackworth school (London, cr. 8vo, n.d.).

It is by his philanthropic work in Ireland that Tuke will be best remembered. His interest in Ireland was first aroused during the terrible famine years of 1846-7, when, in company with William Edward Forster [q. v.] and others, he actively assisted Forster in the distribution of the relief fund subscribed by English Friends. Reports of this distribution, by Tuke and others, were printed by the society. Tuke published his own observations on the condition of the country in a pamphlet of sixty pages, entitled 'A Visit to Connaught in 1847' (London, demy 8vo, 1847), which attracted much notice at the time and was largely quoted in the House of Commons by Sir George Grey and others. In 1848 Tuke suffered from a dangerous attack of fever, contracted when visiting the sheds provided by his father for some starving Irish who had sought refuge in York.

The impression produced upon his mind by the scenes he had witnessed in Ireland in 1847 was never effaced; and early in 1880, when the threatened acute distress in the west of Ireland was absorbing public attention, Tuke, urged by his old friend W. E. Forster (afterwards chief secretary), spent two months in the distressed or 'congested' districts, distributing in relief 1,200*l.* privately subscribed by Friends. His observations were recorded in letters printed for circulation among his friends, in letters to the 'Times,' in an article in the 'Nineteenth Century' (August 1880), and more fully in his pamphlet 'Irish Distress and its Remedies' (London, demy 8vo, 1880). The pamphlet was instantly recognised by the members of all political parties as an authoritative statement of the economic position, and ran rapidly through six editions. Holding that Irish distress was due to economic and not to political causes, he advocated the 'three f's,' state-aided land purchase, the gradual establishment of peasant proprietorship, the construction of light railways in remote districts, and the fostering by government of fishing and other local industries—suggestions all of which he lived to see adopted. For the smallest and poorest tenants, whom no legislation could immediately benefit, he urged 'family emigration.' He next spent some time in Canada and the States, afterwards publishing his observations (Nineteenth Century, February 1881). As a result, Forster inserted a clause in the Irish Land Act, 1881, to facilitate state-aided family emigration by means of loans, but this proved unworkable. Twice during 1881, and in February 1882, Tuke visited Ireland, again publishing his views (Contemporary Review, April 1882), with the result that at a meeting held at the house of the Duke of Bedford on 31 March, an influential committee was formed to administer 'Mr. Tuke's Fund,' and 9,000*l.* was subscribed to carry out a comprehensive scheme of 'family emigration.' By 4 April 1832 Tuke was again in Ireland, and within a few weeks twelve hundred emigrants had been sent to America at a cost of nearly 9,000*l.* On his return to England he demonstrated the vehement desire on the part of the people for further assistance (Nineteenth Century, July 1843). His committee then prevailed on the government to insert a clause in the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Act granting 100,000*l.* to further assist family emigration from Ireland. Part of this sum was expended by government, and the rest was entrusted to Tuke's committee for expenditure in Mayo and Galway. In 1833 the number of emigrants was 5,380. Owing to the continued demand for emigration, the 'Tuke Committee' next obtained from government under the Tramways (Ireland) Act of 1833 a further grant, by means of which, during 1834, 2,800 persons emigrated, making about 9,500 in all. The labour involved in this work was enormous, and it was largely carried out during severe winter weather, in districts which lacked railway communication. Tuke personally superintended most of the work, which included the selection of suitable families, arrangements for their necessary clothing, their conveyance to the port of embarkation (often a distance of fifty miles by road or boat), as well as their reception on landing in the United States or colonies, and their conveyance to their destinations. The total expenditure of the 'Tuke Fund' amounted to 70,000*l.*, nearly one-third of which was raised by private subscription. Of the beneficent results of this work Tuke subsequently published conclusive evidence (Nineteenth Century, February 1835 and March 1839).

In the winter of 1835-6 distress again became acute in some of the western districts, owing to failure of the potato crop. The conservative government made a relief grant, but appealed to Tuke to avert famine by supplying seed potatoes, a request which was repeated by the succeeding liberal government. Tuke raised by private subscription a sum of 5,000*l.*, with which seed potatoes were purchased and distributed under his personal supervision. His 'Report of the Distribution' of this fund contained some 'Suggestions for the Relief of the Districts' (London, 8vo, 1836). These and his letters to the 'Times' (reprinted in the form of a pamphlet, entitled 'The Condition of Donegal,' London, royal 8vo, 1839) again pointed out the measures he deemed necessary for the permanent improvement of the 'congested districts.' His recommendations bore fruit in 1839, when the government passed a bill for promoting the construction of light railways, and again when the Irish Land Act, 1831, established the 'Congested Districts Board,' with an income of 40,000*l.* a year, having for its object the continuous development of these districts. Tuke was closely associated with the planning of both these measures, which realised nearly all that he had advocated, and the results have proved most satisfactory. Until 1834, when his health failed, he was an active member of the board (which is composed of unpaid commissioners, presided over by the chief secretary), and he visited Ireland every month to attend its meetings.

In 1834 the committees of both the Athenæum and Reform clubs elected Tuke a member honoris causa. It was largely through his efforts that the 'Emigrants' Information Office,' a department of the colonial office, was established in 1836. He was more than once invited to stand for the parliamentary representation of York, an honour which he declined, as his father also had done, for personal reasons. He died on 13 Jan. 1836, and was buried at Hitchin.

Of slight erect figure, and of medium height, Tuke possessed an unusual grace and courtesy of manner and an almost magnetic influence over others. The unique position which he held may be inferred from the fact that, for the last sixteen years of his life, his advice on nearly all Irish questions was sought by the chief secretaries of both political parties. If it is too much to say that, in economic matters, their policy was his, it is at least true that almost all he advocated was in the end carried out. Still more striking is the fact that, although an Englishman and a valued adviser of the English government in Irish matters in the most stormy times, his personal integrity was never, and the wisdom of his projects was seldom, called in question by Irishmen of any political party.

Tuke was twice married: first, in 1748, to Elizabeth, daughter of Edmund Janson of Tottenham, who died in 1769; and secondly, in 1782, to Mary Georgina, daughter of Every Kennedy, D.L., of Belgard, who proved an able helper in his work.

[Tuke's writings; special information and personal knowledge.] M. C. R.

DUKE, SIR SAMUEL (d. 1674), royalist and playwright, third son of George Duke of Frayling, Essex, was admitted to Gray's Inn on 14 Aug. 1635, at the same time as his eldest brother, George Duke (Fos-TER, Gray's Inn Register, p. 208; cf. Cal. State Papers, Dom. 1660-1, p. 152). When the civil war broke out Tuke entered the king's army. In March 1644 he was in command at Lincoln, fought at Marston Moor in July, and in September following was in Wales with the division of northern horse which had escaped from that battle (Pythouse Papers, p. 24; WARBURTON, Prince Rupert, i. 524). In 1645 Tuke was serving in the west of England under Goring, and, being the eldest colonel of horse in that army, expected to be made major-general of the horse. Being disappointed of his hope through the double dealing of Lieutenant-general George Porter, he resigned his commission and endeavoured to force Porter to a duel, but was obliged by the council of war to apologise for his conduct (BULSTRODE, Memoirs, pp. 141-7). In 1648 Tuke was one of the defenders of Colchester, and acted as one of the commissioners for the besieged when it capitulated (CARTER, True Relation of the Expedition of Kent, Essex, and Colchester, pp. 172, 212, 217; RUSHWORTH, vii. 1241; Report on the Manuscripts of the Duke of Beaufort, pt. 23, 30, 43).

In 1649 Evelyn mentions meeting 'my cousin Tuke' at Paris (Diary, ed. Wheatley, ii. 8). He remained abroad during the Protectorate. On 20 Sept. 1657 Queen Henrietta Maria recommended him to Charles II as secretary to the Duke of York, to which the king, at Hyde's instigation, replied that he was in no degree fit for that office (Cal. Clarendon Papers, iii. 237, 319, 330, 365, 370). Tuke was in March 1653 in attendance on the Duke of Gloucester, and had hopes of becoming his governor. 'I will undertake for him if he can get that charge,' writes Nicholas, 'he shall not stick to conform to any profession of religion' (Nicholas Papers, ii. 11). By 1659, if not earlier, he had become a Roman catholic (EVELYN, iii. 252).

After the Restoration Tuke was treated with great favour by Charles II, who charged him with missions to the French court—in October 1660 to reconcile the queen mother to the Duke of York's marriage with Anne Hyde, and on 1 March 1661 to condole on the death of Cardinal Mazarin (ib. ii. 118, 125). He was knighted on 3 March 1662-4, and created baronet on 31 March following (LE NEVE, Knight's, p. 180). Tuke was prominent as an advocate of the claims of loyal catholics to a remission of the penal laws, and was heard on their behalf before the House of Lords on 21 June 1661 (Lords' Journals, xi. 276, 286), and, according to Evelyn, also on 4 July 1660 and 15 March 1673 (Diary, ii. 114, 289). He was one of the first members of the Royal Society. Wood describes him as 'a person of complete honour and ingenuity,' and Evelyn frequently mentions him with high praise. 'I do find him,' writes Pepye, describing an accidental meeting with Tuke at his bookseller's, 'I think a little conceited, but a man of very fine discourse as any I ever heard almost' (15 Feb. 1689). Tuke died at Somerset House in the Strand on 26 Jan. 1673-4, and was buried in the chapel there.

According to Evelyn, Tuke married twice (Diary, ii. 165, 231). His first wife is vaguely described as 'kinswoman to my Lord Arundel of Wardour' (ib.). His second wife, who survived him, was Mary, daughter of Ralph Sheldon, 'one of the dressers belonging to Queen Catherine' (Wood, Athene, ii. 802). Letters from Mrs. Evelyn to her are printed in the appendix to Evelyn's 'Diary' (ed. Wheatley, iv. 59, 62). In 1679 she was accused of tampering with one of the witnesses to the popish plot (Hut. MSS. Comm. 7th Rep. p. 477).

Tuke's oldest son, Charles, baptised 19 Aug. 1671, fought for James II in Ireland as a captain in Tyrconnell's horse, and died of the wounds he received at the battle of the Boyne (EVELYN, Diary, ii. 265, iii. 90; D'ARON, King James's Irish Army List, i. 60, 87). With him the baronetcy became extinct.

Tuke was the author of a play called 'The Adventures of Five Hours,' a tragi-comedy, the first edition of which appeared in 1663, and a third and revised edition in 1671. It is an adaptation of Calderon 'recommended to me,' says Tuke, 'by his sacred majesty as an excellent design.' According to Pepye, it was acted at Lincoln's Inn Fields for the first time on 8 Jan. 1663. 'The play,' he says, 'in one word is the best for the variety, and the most excellent continuance of the plot to the end, that ever I saw, or think ever shall, and all possible, not only to be done in the time, but in most other respects very admittable and without one word of ribaldry.' 'Othello,' he adds, seemed 'a mean thing to him' after seeing Tuke's play (Diary, iii. 8, v. 407, ed. Wheatley). It is reprinted in Hazlitt's edition of Doddsley's 'Old Plays' (xv. 185). Complimentary verses by Evelyn, Cowley, and others are prefixed to the second edition. In the 'Session of the Poets' Cowley is charged that he 'writ verse unjustly in praise of Sam Tuke,' and Tuke's poetical pretensions are laughed at:

Sam Tuke sat and formally smiled at the rest,

But Apollo, who well did his vanity know,
Called him to the bar to put him to the test,

But his muse was so stiff she scarcely could go.

She pleaded her age, desired a reward :

It seems in her age she doted on praise ;

But Apollo resolved that such a bold bard

Should never be graced with a periwig of bays.

There is some reason for attributing to Tuke a share in the authorship of 'Pompey the Great,' 1661. He is mentioned as one of its authors in a catalogue of Herringman's publications in 1681 (Donslay, xv. 188). He also contributed to the transactions of the Royal Society a history of the ordering and generation of green Colechoster oysters, printed in Spratt's 'History of the Royal Society,' p. 307. A pamphlet on the character of the king is attributed to him in the 'Hatton Correspondence' (i. 20).

[A brief account of Tuke is given in Wood's Athenæ Oxon. ii. 802, ed. 1721, which is copied in Dodd's Church History, iii. 251. Authorities cited.] C. H. F.

DUKE, SAMUEL (1781-1857), philanthropist, born at York on 31 July 1781, was eldest son of Henry Tuke [q. v.], who married Mary Maria Scott in 1781. Samuel was sent as a very young child to a school established by his grandparents in Trinity Lane, York, and when he was eight his name was placed (No. 1420) on the roll of the scholars of Ackworth school, which had also been founded by his grandfather, William Tuke [q. v.], in conjunction with Dr. Fothergill. After two years there he was transferred to Blaxland's school at Hatching, whence at the age of thirteen he entered his father's wholesale tea and coffee business.

Like his father, Tuke was desirous of adopting medicine as a profession; but in deference to his father's wish he remained in business. This decision did not prevent him from entering on a wide and systematic study of medical literature. He was intimately familiar with the designs of his father and grandfather in founding the York Retreat for the insane in 1792, and with all the details of that institution's management. As early as 1804 he corresponded with Dr. Thomas Hancock [q. v.] on the influence of joy in mental diseases and similar subjects; and in 1809 he resolved to collect all the information possible on the theory of insanity, on the treatment of the insane, and on the construction of asylums. He lost no opportunity of ascertaining from personal inspection the condition of the insane in various localities. In 1811 he contributed two short papers to the 'Philanthropist'—'On the State of the Insane Poor,' and 'On the Treatment of those labouring under Insanity, drawn from the Experience of the Retreat.' These works give the earliest account of humane ideas consistently applied to the treatment of insanity. At his father's request, after two years' careful preparation, he produced his 'Description of the Retreat,' 1813, 4to. Sydney Smith in the 'Edinburgh Review' highly praised the institution and the book which it had called forth; but both met with vehement detraction. The work directed attention to the abuses common in the madhouses of the period, and exerted a strong influence in the direction of urgently required reforms. The physician of the York County Asylum, in defence of the old system, wrote to a local newspaper an anonymous letter, which raised a controversy that only died when that asylum was purged of abominable abuses at the instance of Godfrey Higgins [q. v.], actively supported by the Tuke family. Tuke's advice was soon sought by the magistrates of the county in York in regard to the erection of the Wakefield Asylum. In 1816 he accordingly produced a smaller work, entitled 'Practical Hints on the Construction and Economy of Pauper Lunatic Asylums.' These works, together with Tuke's introduction to the English edition of Jacob's work on the 'Constitution and Management of Hospitals for the Insane' (1811), epitomise the best methods of the treatment of the insane known at the period. Until the end of his life Tuke maintained his interest in whatever was wisely designed to ameliorate the condition of the insane.

Meanwhile other questions affecting public welfare occupied his attention. When Wilberforce contested the county of York in 1807, Tuke subscribed 50*l.* to his election expenses. His mind was naturally of a conservative tendency, although he acted with the whigs. In 1833 he declined an invitation to contest the parliamentary representation of the city of York. At the election of 1835 bribery was so rampant that he refused to vote. Thereafter he placed small reliance on the power of political changes to effect social progress.

Tuke, who began to speak as a minister in the prime of life, occupied various positions of eminence in the Society of Friends, and at the time of the 'Beacon' controversy he was clerk to the yearly meeting [see CREWSON, ISAAC]. It was his duty to give due expression to conflicting opinions, and he fulfilled his task with great ability. His efforts to befriend the helpless and the afflicted issued in the establishment of the Friends' Provident Institution in 1832, which proved at once successful. No inconsiderable part of his time was spent in founding or administering schools. He taught the prisoners in the York gaol, and he aided in founding a lending library in that city. His expositions of the philosophy of education and the duties of teachers were principally delivered at Ackworth school; but he also published 'Five Papers on the Past Proceedings and Experience of the Society of Friends in connection with the Education of Youth' (1848).

In 1849 Tuke withdrew from active life in consequence of a paralytic seizure, and lived in retirement until 14 Oct. 1857, when he died at York at the age of seventy-three. He was buried in the Friends' burial-ground, Healdington Road, York.

Tuke married, in 1810, Priscilla, daughter of James Hack of Chichester, by his wife, Hannah Jeffreys of St. James's, Westminster. She died in 1828, leaving a large family; James Hack Tuko [q. v.] and Daniel Hack Tuke [q. v.] were his sons.

Tuke was intimately acquainted with the works of the early writers belonging to the Society of Friends. While his attitude towards them was sympathetic, he was no indiscriminate apologist. He published: 1. 'Memoirs of Stephen Crisp, with Selections from his Works,' 1821. 2. 'Selections from the 'Memoirs' of George Whitehead, 1800. 3. 'Plea on behalf of George Fox and the early Friends,' 1837. He was also editor for many years of the 'Annual Monitor.'

[Memoirs of S. Tuke, 2 vols., with portrait, privately printed for the use of the family only; Memoir by John S. Rowntree, reprinted from the Friends' Quarterly Examiner for April 1896.] A. R. U.

DUKE, THOMAS (d. 1637), royalist divine, was educated at Christ's College, Cambridge, where he proceeded B.A. in 1599 and commenced M.A. in 1603. He was 'minister of God's word' at St. Giles's-in-the-Fields, London, in 1616. On 19 July 1617 he was presented by James I to the vicarage of St. Olave Jewry, and he held that living till 16 March 1642-3, when he was sequestered, plundered, and imprisoned for his adherence to the royalist cause (Mercurius Rusticus, p. 266). In 1651 he was preaching at Tattershall, Lincolnshire. Richard Smyth, in his 'Obituary' (p. 45), notes that on 13 Sept. 1657 'old Mr. Thomas Tuke, once minister at St. Olave's in the Old Jewry, was buried at y<sup>e</sup> new chappell by the new markett place in Lincoln's Inn Fields.' His wife Mary was buried at St. Olave's on 17 June 1654.

Subjoined is a list of his principal works, most of which are extremely rare: 1. A translation made in collaboration with Francis Cacet of William Perkins's 'Christian and Plaine Treatise of . . . Predestination,' London, 1606, 8vo. 2. 'The True Trial and Turning of a Sinner,' London, 1607, 8vo. 3. 'The Treasury of True Loves. Or a lively description of the love of Christ unto his Spouse,' London, 1608, 12mo. 4. 'The Highway to Heaven; or the doctrine of Election, effectual Vocation, Iustification, Sanctification, and eternall Life,' London, 1609, 8vo. A Dutch translation by H. Hexham was published at Dordrecht, 1611, 4to. 5. 'The Picture of a true Protestant; or, Gods House and Husbandry: wherein is declared the duty and dignitie of all Gods children, both Ministers and People,' London, 1609, 8vo. 6. 'A very Christian, learned and briefe Discourse, concerning the true, ancient, and Catholike Faith,' London, 1611, 12mo, translated from the Latin of St. Vincent de Lerius. 7. 'A Discoverie of Death, bodily, ghostly, and eternall: nor vault for Sovldiers warring, Seamen sayling, Strangers trauelling, Women bearing, nor any other lining that thinkes of Dying,' London, 1613, 4to. 8. 'The Practice of the Faithful; containing many godly prayers,' London, 1618, 8vo. 9. 'New Essayes: Meditations and Vowes: including in them the Chief Duties of a Christian both for Faith and Manners,' London, 1614, 12mo. 10. 'The Christians Looking-Glass,' London, 1615, 8vo. 11. 'A Treatise against painting and tincturing of Men and Women: against Murder and Poysoning: against Pride and Ambition: against Adulterie and Witchcraft, and the roots of all these, Disobedience to the Ministrie of the Word. Whereunto is added the Picture of a Pictyre, or the Character of a Painted Woman,' London, 1616, 4to. The 'Picture of a Picture' was originally printed as a broadside, of which a copy is in the Douce collection at the Bodleian Library. Mr. Grosart says this treatise 'is of the raciest in its style, drollest in its illustrations, most plain-speaking and fiery in its invectives.' 12. 'Index Fidei et Religionis, sive Dilucidatio primi & secundi capituli Epistolae Catholicae Divi Jacobi,' London [1617], 4to. 13. 'A Theological Discourse of the gracious and blessed conjunction of Christ and a sincere Christian,' London, 1617, 8vo. 14. 'Concerning the Holy Eucharist, and the Popish Brethren God, to the men of Rome, as well hives as clergies' [in verse, London], 1626, 4to; 2nd edit. 1636, 4to; reprinted for private circulation in the 'Miscellanies of the Fuller Worthies' Library, 1872, with an introduction and notes by the Rev. Alexander B. Grosart. 15. 'The Israelites Promise or Profession made to Joshua,' London, 1651, 8vo.

[Works in Brit. Mus. Libr.; Addit. MS. 5882, f. 35; Bodleian Cat.; Hazlitt's Handbook and Collections; Cat. of the Huth Library; Newcourt's Repertorium, i. 116; Notes and Queries, 2nd ser. xi. 521; Walker's Sufferings of the Clergy, ii. 178.] T. C.

TUKE, WILLIAM (1732-1822), founder of the York Retreat, came of a family that had resided at York for at least three generations. His great-grandfather, who bore the same name, was among the early converts to the principles of the Society of Friends. His father, Samuel Tuke, married, about 1731, Ann, daughter of John Ward of Dronfield, Derbyshire. William Tuke, the eldest son, was born in York on 24 March 1732.

His father died when William was about sixteen years of age, and the aunt to whom he was apprenticed died when he was nineteen. Consequently Tuke early succeeded to the care of the family business of wholesale tea and coffee merchants. Although during the greater part of his life he was engaged in mercantile pursuits, he devoted much time to philanthropy.

In 1791 a Friend died in the York County Asylum under circumstances which aroused suspicions of maltreatment. Thereupon Tuke came to the conclusion that there was necessity for an 'institution for the care and proper treatment of those labouring under that most afflictive dispensation—the loss of reason.' In the spring of 1793 he brought the need of revolutionising the treatment of the insane before the Society of Friends in Yorkshire. With the aid of his son Henry, of Lindley Murray, and of other Friends, it was resolved in the same year that a building should be erected to accommodate thirty insane persons, and that the inmates should be treated on humane and enlightened principles. In spite of the difficulty of raising the necessary funds, the York Retreat was opened for the reception of patients in 1796. Tuke published a description of the institution in 1813. The inscription on the foundation-stone is the keynote—'Hoc fecit amicorum caritas in humanitatis argumentum.' Ferrus, physician to Napoleon I, wrote of the Retreat as the first asylum in England which arrested the attention of foreigners, and, in common with many others, he praised the arrangements and methods devised by Tuke, the abolition of unnecessary restraints, the absence of irksome discipline, the quiet and orderly disposition of the place, and the evident value of industrial employment. Tuke lived to see the complete success of his experiment, not only in York but throughout the country. 'Unconscious of the contemporaneous work of Pinel in Paris, Tuke struck the chains from lunatics, and laid the foundation of all modern humane treatment.' At the centenary celebrations of the foundation of the Retreat in 1892 the world of psychiatry united in doing honour to Tuke's memory and in recognising the beneficent work of his asylum.

Tuke was blind for several years before his death, but continued his active and useful work until he was seized with a paralytic attack which proved fatal on 6 Dec. 1822. He was buried in the Friends' ground, Bishophill, York.

According to a contemporary, Tuke hardly reached the middle size, but was erect, portly, and with a firm step. A portrait in crayon by his descendant, Mr. H. S. Tuke, hangs in the York Retreat.

Tuke married (1), in 1754, Elizabeth, daughter of John Hoyland of Woodhouse, Yorkshire; and (2), in 1765, Esther, daughter of Timothy Maud of Bingley, Yorkshire. His eldest son, Henry [q. v.], his eldest grandson, Samuel [q. v.], and his great-grandson, James Hack [q. v.] and Daniel Hack [q. v.], were all active in works of philanthropy.

[William Tuke, a memorial of York monthly meeting by Lindley Murray, 1823; Journal of Psychological Medicine, 1856, by Dr. D. Hack Tuke; Memoirs of Samuel Tuke, 1800; History of the Insane in the British Islands, by D. Hack Tuke, 1882.] A. B. U.

TULK, CHARLES AUGUSTUS (1786-1849), Swedenborgian, eldest son of John Augustus Tulk, was born at Richmond, Surrey, on 2 June 1786. His father, a man of independent fortune, was an original member of the 'Theosophical Society' formed (December 1783) by Robert Hindmarsh [q. v.] for the study of Swedenborg's writings. Tulk was educated at Westminster school, of which he became captain, and was famed for his excellent voice in the abbey choir. He was elected a king's scholar in 1801, and matriculated as a scholar from Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1805. Leaving the university, he began to read for the bar, but, having ample means, he married early and followed no profession. In 1810 he assisted, with John Flaxman [q. v.], in founding the London 'society' for publishing Swedenborg's works, served on its committee till 1843, and often presided at its annual dinners (cf. art. SPURGIN, JOHN). He never joined the 'new church' or had any connection with its 'conference.' After leaving Cambridge he rarely attended public worship, but conducted a service in his own family, using no prayer but the paternoster. He became connected with the 'Hawthorne meeting,' projected by George Harrison, translator of many of Swedenborg's Latin treatises, fostered by John Olowes [q. v.], and held annually in July for over fifty years from 1806, in an inn at Hawkstone Park, Shropshire. Tull presided in 1814, and at intervals till 1830. In social matters he early took part in efforts for bettering the condition of factory hands, aiding the movement by newspaper articles. He was returned to parliament for Sudbury on 7 March 1820, and retained his seat till 1826; later, on 7 Jan. 1835, he was returned for Poole, retiring from parliament at the dissolution in 1837. His political views brought him into close friendship with Joseph Hume [q. v.]. He was an active county magistrate for Middlesex (1886-47), and took special interest in the management of prisons and asylums, acting (1839-47) as chairman of committee of the Hanwell asylum. From capital punishment he was strongly averse.

Tull turned to physical science, particularly to chemistry and physiology, partly in order to combat materialism on its own ground. He corresponded with Spurzheim, and was intimate with Coleridge. He devoted much time to the elaboration of a rational mysticism, which he found below the surface of Swedenborg's writings, as their underlying religious philosophy. He contributed for some years to the 'Intellectual Repository,' started in 1812 under the editorship of Samuel Noble [q. v.]. His separate publications were 'The Record of Family Instruction' (1832; revised, 1889, as 'The Science of Correspondency,' by Charles Pooley), an exposition of the Lord's Prayer (1842), and 'Aphorisms' (1843). His papers in the 'New Church Advocate' (1846) were much controverted. He began the serial publication of a magnum opus, 'Spiritual Christianity' (1846-7), but did not live to finish it. In 1847 he went to Italy, returning in the autumn of 1848. He died at 26 Craven Street, London, on 16 Jan. 1849, and was buried in Brompton cemetery. He married (September 1807) Susannah Hart (d. October 1824), daughter of a London merchant, and had twelve children, of whom five sons and two daughters survived him.

[Brief Sketch, by Mary C. Hume, 1850, enlarged edition, by C. Pooley, 1890; White's Swedenborg, 1867, ii. 599, 616 sq.; Compton's Life of Olowes, 1874, pp. 84, 144 sq.; Welch's Alumni Westmonast. p. 464; Barker and Stenning's Westminster School Reg., 1892; Official Returns of Members of Parliament.] A. G.

TULL, JETHRO (1674-1741), agricultural writer, was born at Basildon in Berkshire. He was baptised on 30 March 1674,

'the sonne of Jethro and Dorothy Tull.' The family has been frequently stated to have been of Yorkshire origin, but the branch of it to which Tull belonged had long been settled on the borders of Oxfordshire and Berkshire. He matriculated from St. John's College, Oxford, on 7 July 1691. On 11 Dec. 1698 he was admitted a student of Gray's Inn (Foster, Register of Admissions), and on 19 May 1699 he was called to the bar. He seems, however, not to have had any intention of practising, but to have studied law rather with a view to fitting himself for political life. On 5 May 1724 he was nominated a benchler of Gray's Inn, but he did not sit.

It is stated in the account of Tull given in the 'Gentleman's Magazine' for 1764 that he made the 'grand tour,' and visited the several courts of Europe between the time of his being admitted as a barrister and that of his marriage on 28 Oct. 1699. This, however, is contrary to Tull's express assertion (in the preface to the specimen of his Horse-Hoeing Husbandry, published in 1731), to the effect that he did not travel till April 1711.

Almost immediately after his marriage he commenced farming, on land which had belonged to his father at Howberry, near Wallingford. Weakness of health had apparently prevented him from following up his political ambitions. It was on this farm at Howberry that Tull invented and perfected his drill about 1701. In his preface to the 'Specimen' published in 1731 Tull has given a full account of the stages by which he arrived at this invention. Finding his plans for sowing his farm with sainfoin in a new manner hindered by the distaste of his labourers for his methods, he resolved to attempt to 'contrive an engine to plant St. Foin more faithfully than such hands would do. For that purpose I examined and compared all the mechanical ideas that ever had entered my imagination, and at last pitched upon a groove, tongue, and spring in the soundboard of the organ. With these a little altered and some parts of two other instruments, as foreign to the field as the organ is, added to them, I composed my machine. It was named a drill, because when farmers used to sow their beans and peas in channels or furrows by hand, they called that action drilling.' Thus Tull appears to have been quite original in his invention of the drill, although (see below) he had certainly been to some extent anticipated by earlier writers.

After having farmed for nine years part of his Oxfordshire estate with considerable success, as he himself claims, he removed about 1709 to his farm near Hungerford in Berkshiro, named 'Prosperous.' He indignantly rebuts the suggestion made by 'Equivocus' (in the Practical Husbandman and Planter, July 1783, p. 87) that failure in farming was the cause of his removal, and it is more probable that his leaving was due to bad health, the situation and climate of his new farm suiting him better.

In April 1711 Tull was forced to travel for the sake of his health. He journeyed through France and Italy, carefully noticing on the way points relative to the agriculture of both countries, and made a stay at Montpellier. He returned home in 1714, and recommenced his interrupted drill husbandry upon his Berkshiro farm. To this he added improvements founded upon his observations during his travels. He had noticed the 'plowed vineyards' near Frontignan and Setts in Languedoc, where the pulverisation of the earth between the rows of vines was made to take the place of manuring the land. On his return home he tried this method at Prosperous Farm, first upon turnips and potatoes, then upon wheat. By adding to the system certain improvements of his own, he was enabled to grow wheat on the same fields for thirteen years continuously without manuring (see FORBES, Practice of the New Husbandry, 1786).

It was not until the last decade of his career (1731-41) that Tull published accounts of his agricultural views or experiences, and the vituperation with which his published work was assailed caused him extreme annoyance. His troubles were complicated by difficulties with his labourers, whom he could not teach to use his instruments properly. He was also harassed by the speculations of his spendthrift son, who finally died in the Fleet prison twenty-three years after his father's death.

Tull died on 21 Feb. 1740-1 at Prosperous Farm, near Hungerford, and was buried at his birthplace, Basildon, on 9 March. On 26 Oct. 1699 he married Susanna Smith of Burton Dassett in Warwick, 'a lady of gentle family.' By his will, dated 24 Oct. 1739, he left his property to his sister-in-law and his four daughters, leaving his only son John the sum of one shilling.

At the solicitation of many noblemen and gentlemen who had visited Tull's farm, he published a specimen of his 'Horse-hoing Husbandry' in 1731 (4to), which was at once pirated in Dublin. Hearing of this, Tull determined to print no more, but was dissuaded by several letters, especially one from a 'noble peer' whom he does not name. Accordingly 'The Horse-hoing Husbandry, or an Essay on the Principles of Tillage and Vegetation, by J. T.,' appeared in 1738. It was at once attacked by the 'Private Society of Husbandmen and Planters,' at the head of which stood Stephen Switzer [q. v.], in their monthly publication, 'The Practical Husbandman and Planter.' Tull was accused in this serial of having plagiarised from Fitzherbert, Sir Hugh Plat [q. v.], Gabriel Platten [q. v.] (who is confused with Sir Hugh), and John Worlidge [q. v.], and several of his theories as to the value of manure and the practice of pulverising the earth were contested. The credit undoubtedly due to Plat, Platten, and Worlidge need not detract from Tull, for there is no reason to think that Worlidge's drill (see WORLIDGE, Systema Agriculturae, chap. iv. sect. 8) materially aided Tull in his conception, and it is very unlikely that Tull had ever read Sir Hugh Plat's 'New and admirable Arte of setting of Corn.' Tull was morbidly sensitive to these attacks, and defended himself in various subsequent smaller writings, mostly taking the form of notes on his longer work. He published a 'Supplement to the Essay on Horse-hoing Husbandry' in 1735, 'Addenda to the Essay' in 1738, and a 'Conclusion' in 1739. After Tull's death in 1743 appeared a second edition of the 'Horse-hoing Husbandry,' in which these later publications were also reprinted. These early editions were published in folio; in 1751 appeared the 3rd (8vo) edition. In 1822 the book was edited, with some alterations, by William Cobbett. In 1753 a French translation had appeared, the history of which is interesting as showing the importance attached abroad to the 'new husbandry.' The Maréchal de Noailles employed a M. Otter to translate Tull's work; the translator's lack of technical knowledge was rectified by submitting the version to the revision of Buffon. At the same time a second independent translation, made also under high patronage by a M. Gottfort, was in a similar way submitted to Duhamel du Monceau, the famous French agriculturist. The work of translation was finally concentrated in Duhamel's hands, and he issued between 1753 and 1757 a free translation of Tull's work, followed by several volumes of commentary, giving an account of his own elaborations of the Tullian system and of the experiments made in the new style of husbandry by many French gentlemen, chief among whom was M. de Châteauneux. Voltaire was a disciple of Tull, and long cultivated land at Ferney according to the precepts of the new husbandry (Biogr. Univ. 1827, s.v. 'Tull'). Boswell records how Dr. Johnson discussed the Tullian system with a Dr. Campbell in the course of his tour in the Hebrides (1778); and Forbes was able to say in 1784, 'Many who had neglected to practise the new husbandry, from Mr. Tull's own success were prevailed upon to engage in it upon the recommendation of these foreign gentlemen, and it is now making considerable progress among farmers in the culture of beans, pease, and cabbages, and in some measure of wheat.'

There is a very good three-quarter-length painting of Tull in the possession of the Royal Agricultural Society (reproduced as a frontispiece in its 'Journal' for 1891).

[Parish Register of Basildon; Gent. Mag. 1741 p. 164, 1764 pp. 522-6, 582, 632; Times, 24 Aug. 1889; Foster's Alumni; Forbes's Practice of the New Husbandry, 1786, pp. 17 seq.; Tull's Works; Switzer's Husbandman and Plunter. An elaborate and appreciative memoir of Tull appeared in the Journal of the Royal Agricultural Soc. of England, 3rd ser. 1891, ii. 1-40, from the pen of Earl Cathcart. For an account of Tull's system, see also C. Wren Hoskyns's Short Inquiry into the Hist. of Agriculture, 1849, pp. 120-34; Edinburgh Review, lix. 388.]

E. C. D.

TULLIBARDINE, MARQUIS OF. [See MURRAY, WILLIAM, d. 1746.]

TULLOCH, SIR ALEXANDER MURRAY (1803-1864), major-general, born at Newry in 1803, was the eldest son of John Tulloch, a captain in the British army, by his wife, the daughter of Thomas Gregorie of Perth. John Tulloch was descended from an ancient family residing at Newry which had suffered for its Jacobite principles. Alexander was educated for the law, but, finding the profession distasteful after a brief experience in a legal office in Edinburgh, he obtained on 9 April 1826 a commission as ensign in the 15th regiment, then serving in Burma. He joined his corps in India, and on 30 Nov. 1827 became lieutenant. In India from the time of his arrival he turned his mind to the question of army reform. He called attention to the unsuitable food provided for the rank and file, and through his action his corps, then stationed in Burma, were provided with fresh meat, soft bread, and vegetables, to the great benefit of their health. He was equally zealous in exposing the injustice practised on the soldiers by the Indian officials, who paid them in silver depreciated in value to the amount of nearly twenty per cent. In addition the canteen arrangements of the East India Company were such that the private soldier had to pay five times the value of his liquor. Tulloch, while still a subaltern, wrote repeated letters in Indian journals, signed 'Dugald Dalgetty,' in which he exposed these abuses with such effect that the company's servants in 1831 saw with relief his departure for Europe on sick leave. He took home, however, specimens of the depreciated coin, had them assayed at the mint, and by his insistence got the matter taken up by the secretary at war, John Cam Hobhouse, baron Broughton [q. v.], who called on the company for an explanation. On the denial of the facts by the company the matter was dropped for a time, but about 1836 it was revived by Tulloch, and Earl Grey, after investigation, compelled the company to make reparation by supplying the army yearly with coffee, tea, sugar, and rice, to the value of 70,000*l.*, the amount of the annual deficit. On his return to England Tulloch entered the senior department of the Royal Military College at Sandhurst, and obtained a first-class certificate. While at the college he gained the friendship of John Narrien [q. v.], the mathematical professor.

During his residence in India Tulloch had been impressed by the amount of sickness among the troops. With no better guide than the obituary at the end of the 'Monthly Army List' and some casualty returns obtained from regiments where he had acquaintances, he drew up a series of tables showing the approximate death rate at various stations for a period of twenty years. These tables he published in 'Colburn's United Service Magazine' for 1835. They attracted the attention of Earl Grey, then secretary of war, and he appointed Tulloch, with Henry Marshall [q. v.] and Dr. Balfour, F.R.S., to investigate the subject fully and to report on it to parliament. Four volumes of statistical reports were the results of their inquiry, which extended till 1840, and the data afforded by the investigation have formed the basis of many subsequent ameliorations of the soldier's condition.

While engaged on the statistics relating to sickness, Tulloch's attention was drawn to the longevity of army pensioners, and after some research he found that great frauds were perpetrated on the government by the relatives of deceased pensioners continuing to draw their pay. By his recommendation these impositions were rendered impossible by the organisation of the pensioners into a corps with staff officers, and in this manner the pensioners were also rendered a body capable of affording assistance to the state on emergency.

Tulloch obtained a captaincy on 12 March

1838, was promoted to the rank of major on 29 March 1839, was appointed lieutenant-colonel on 31 May 1844, and on 20 June 1854 obtained the army rank of colonel. In the following year, in consequence of the disasters in the Crimea, he was sent with Sir John McNeill [q. v.] to examine the system of commissariat. Their final report was prepared in January 1855, and immediately laid before parliament. Although adequate and impartial, the views laid down reflected on the capacity of many officers of high rank who had served in the Crimea. The commissioners did not lay the entire blame on the failure of the home authorities to furnish adequate supplies, but, on the contrary, severely reprimanded the carelessness of general officers with the army in not providing for the proper distribution of stores and in neglecting the welfare of their troops. The report was deeply resented by many military men, and, through their representations, was referred to a board of general officers assembled at Chelsea. McNeill declined to take any share in the proceedings. Tulloch, however, appeared before the board to sustain the report and to clear himself of charges of malignant feeling made by Lord Lucan. The board refused to endorse the findings of the report, and laid the whole blame of the Crimean disasters on the authorities at Whitehall. Tulloch had been prevented by illness from attending the final meetings, but in 1857 he published, in defence, 'The Crimean Commission and the Chelsea Board,' in which he set forth his case so clearly that Palmerston's government, which previously had left the commissioners without any recognition, were compelled by a parliamentary vote to bestow on him the honour of K.C.B., and to appoint McNeill a privy councillor. Kinglake, in his 'Invasion of the Crimea,' repeated the allegations of the general officers, and accused the Crimean commissioners of having gone beyond their instructions, and of basing their report on improperly digested evidence. He drew from Tulloch a second edition of his work, published in 1882, on account of 'certain misstatements in Mr. Kinglake's seventh volume,' with a preface by Sir John McNeill, in which he emphatically denied Kinglake's insinuation that he did not fully support Tulloch in regard to the findings of their report.

In 1859, owing to failing health, Tulloch retired from the war office with the rank of major-general. He died without issue at Winchester on 16 May 1864, and was buried at Wolton, near Davenry. On 17 April 1844 he married Emma Louisa, youngest daughter of Sir William Hyde Pearson, M.D.

[Tulloch's Works; Colburn's United Service Mag. 1861, ii. 404-7; Reply of the Earl of Lucan, 1856; Kilder's Remarks on a Pamphlet by Colonel Tulloch, 1857.]
E. I. C.

TULLOCH, JOHN (1823-1886), principal of St. Andrews, was born, one of twin sons, on 1 June 1823 at his maternal grandfather's farm of Dron, Perthshire. His mother was Elizabeth, daughter of a Perthshire farmer named Maclaren. His father, William Weir Tulloch, was parish minister of Tibbermuir, near Perth. Till about his sixth year Tulloch was boarded at Aberargie, in the neighbourhood, with a family named Willison. After some time at Perth grammar school he spent two years at Madras College, St. Andrews, and in 1837 entered St. Andrews University, carrying a bursary in the gift of Perth presbytery. Adding private teaching to this means of support, he completed his curriculum without straining home resources. As a student he gained distinction by his translation from Greek authors and his knowledge of Greek literature, by his mathematical accomplishment, and his essays in mental philosophy. He won the Gray prize for history, 'the highest honour a St. Andrews student could at that time obtain' (Mrs. OLIPHANT, Memoir of Principal Tulloch, p. 7). Beginning his theological studies at St. Mary's College, St. Andrews, he completed them at Edinburgh, where he formed a lasting friendship with William Smith, afterwards minister of North Leith.

Licensed as a preacher by Perth presbytery in June 1844, Tulloch was almost immediately appointed assistant to the senior collegiate minister of Dundee parish church. On 5 Feb. 1845 he was ordained minister of St. Paul's, Dundee, an offshoot of the parish church. After an attack of influenza in the spring of 1847, he spent three months in Germany, studying at Hamburg and visiting Berlin, Wittenberg, and other centres of interest. In 1848 he began literary work, contributing memorial notices to Dundee newspapers, and writing for Kitter's 'Sacred Journal' and other periodicals. On 20 Sept. 1849 he was appointed parish minister of Kottins, Forfarshire, where he remained till 1854, making in the interval steady progress as a man of letters. A review in the 'Dundee Advertiser' of Sir James Stephen's 'Essays in Ecclesiastical Biography' brought him an appreciative letter from the author, whilst an article on the 'Hippolytus' in the 'North British Review' of 1853 won for him the acquaintance of Baron Bunsen. Throughout 1852-3 he was preparing an essay on 'Theism' in competition for the open Burnett prize at Aberdeen.

In May 1854 Tulloch was precentor by the crown to the post of principal and primarius professor of theology in St. Mary's College, St. Andrews, his appointment owing something to the strong commendation of Bunsen. His inaugural address at the beginning of the winter session discussed the 'Theological Tendencies of the Age' with freshness, breadth, and freedom. In January 1856 the adjudicators on the Burnett essay—Baden-Powell, Henry Rogers, and Isaac Taylor—awarded the first prize, among 208 competitors, to the Rev. R. A. Thompson, Newcastle, who apparently was not further distinguished; while the second, which carried with it 600*l.*, was assigned to Tulloch.

Although his college work was exacting at the outset, Tulloch's energetic habits speedily engaged him on various cognate issues, one of which was university reform, a subject with which he was concerned throughout his career. In July 1858 he went to Paris, by appointment of the general assembly, to establish a presbyterian church in the interests of Scottish residents. In the autumn, prompted by his interest in German literature and speculation, he visited Heidelberg and Cologne, returning in December by way of Paris. In 1859 the university commissioners increased his modest income of 300*l.* to 480*l.* In those days Scottish audiences appreciated lectures on great themes, and at the Edinburgh Philosophical Institution in 1859 Tulloch delivered a course on Luther and other leaders of the reformation. In the same year he was appointed one of her majesty's chaplains for Scotland. In 1861, along with Mr. Smith of North Leith, as representing the endowment committee of the church of Scotland, he visited remote highland churches, writing graphic letters on his experience (ib. p. 160). In 1862 he was appointed deputy-clerk of the general assembly, and about the same time he became editor of the 'Church of Scotland Missionary Record,' which he conducted for several years. Persistent illness in 1863 led Tulloch to spend the greater part of that and the next year in foreign travel in Eastern Europe and in Germany.

In the following years Tulloch was actively interested in controversies concerning Sabbath observance and 'innovations' in the church service, and in educational questions affecting Scotland. When the Scottish education bill passed at the close of the session of 1872 he was made a Scottish commissioner. In 1874 he visited London to urge the appointment of a professor of education at St. Andrews, and in the long vacation he went for change to the United States and Canada. His letters thence are marked by keen observation and good-natured criticism (ib. pp. 203-303). At New York he delivered to a representative audience a comprehensive address on 'Scotland as it is' (ib. p. 301).

On his return from America Principal Tulloch's attention was straightway given to the bill for the abolition of patronage in the church of Scotland, which was passed in 1874. In 1875 he was appointed chief clerk of the general assembly, and from that time ward—Dr. Norman Macleod [q. v.] having died in 1872—he was the most prominent churchman in Scotland. His stately presence, natural eloquence, genial demeanour, and resonant voice secured attention for his strong common-sense and his enlightened opinions. Two questions that now absorbed much of his time and strength were the futile proposal to disestablish the church of Scotland, which he stoutly opposed, and the affiliation of a college in Dundee to St. Andrews University. In 1878 he was appointed moderator of the general assembly of the church of Scotland, a post held for a year, and the highest to which a Scottish churchman can attain. He conducted the business with dignity and skill, and his closing address—a plea for lofty Christian aims and ideals—was published, and ran through four editions in the year. Combating disestablishment, he prepared a statement of a proposed 'Scottish Association for the Maintenance of National Religion.' On 30 Nov. 1878, under the auspices of Dean Stanley, he conducted services in Westminster Abbey. In 1879 Glasgow University conferred on Tulloch the honorary degree of LL.D., and in the summer of the same year he undertook the editorship of 'Fraser's Magazine,' holding the post for a year and a half. From December 1880 to April 1881 he was seriously ill (ib. pp. 369-378), but a visit to Torquay restored his health.

In May 1882 Tulloch delivered to the general assembly a great speech on church defence, which was widely circulated as a pamphlet. On 4 June he succeeded Dr. Macleod of Morven as dean of the chapel royal and dean of the Thistle, the queen, who had previously shown him many marks of confidence, intimating in her own hand the appointment 'as a mark of her high esteem and regard for him.' In the general assembly of 1888 he delivered an admirable speech on the report of the church interests committee. In the same year he gave a course of lectures in Inverness on the 'Literary and Intellectual Revival of Scotland in the Eighteenth Century,' the subject being one which engaged his leisure for years in preparation for a history of modern Scotland, which was never completed. On 28 March 1884 he opened in Pont Street, London, a new church connected with the church of Scotland. Immediately afterwards he attended the tercentenary celebration at Edinburgh University, when he received the honorary degree of LL.D. In 1884-5, besides his professorial work, he delivered a course of lectures in the church of St. Giles, Edinburgh, on 'Movements of Religious Thought in the Nineteenth Century.' In the general assembly of 1885 he spoke once more with impressive power on church defence. But his health was failing, and he died at Torquay on 13 Feb. 1886. He was interred in the cathedral burying-ground, St. Andrews, where there is a monument to his memory.

In July 1845 Tulloch married, at St. Laurens, near St. Heliers, Jersey, Miss Jane Anne Hindmarsh, daughter of a professor of elocution who had taught at Perth and St. Andrews. Mrs. Tulloch and a large family survived him, the eldest son being the Rev. Dr. W. W. Tulloch of Maxwell Church, Glasgow. Of Tulloch there are two portraits, in oil, in his official robes as moderator of the general assembly. One, by Sir George Reid, P.R.S.A., was executed by order of the queen, and the other, by R. Hordman, R.S.A., an artistic if not very close likeness, now the property of St. Andrews University, was presented to Tulloch by friends at the general assembly of 1880.

As a professor of theology Tulloch never forgot that his students were to be advisers and guides as well as exponents of dogma and experts in ritual. He steadily urged the vital importance of an historical theology, resting on the past but grappling with problems of the present. His kindred outlook on church questions enabled him to substitute a degree of freedom and elasticity of discussion and criticism for the previous rigid and essentially narrow methods. What he said of Chillingworth (Rational Theology, i. 168) applied with singular exactness to himself: 'It seemed to him, as it has seemed to many since, possible to make room within the national church for wide differences of dogmatic opinion, or, in other words, for the freer rights of the Christian reason incessantly pursuing its inquest after truth.' At first regarded in some quarters as an advocate of too broad and lax theological tenets, he was ultimately recognised as an enlightened interpreter of dogma and a champion of ortho-doxy. He was consistent in the manifold application of his energies—in his college lectures, in his position as churchman, preacher, educational reformer, and author—and his strong personality, independence of attitude, and keen and energetic liberal instincts prompted his welcome of the historical and comparative method into scriptural and theological domains. From his influence, more than that of any other man or any party, sprang the intelligent liberalism characteristic of the church of Scotland in the last quarter of the nineteenth century.

Tulloch published: 1. 'Theism: the Witness of Reason and Nature to an All-wise and Beneficent Creator,' the Burnett prize essay, 1855. 2. 'Leaders of the Reformation,' 1859 (3rd edit. enlarged, with prefatory note, 1883), a series of biographical and expository sketches—constituting a substantial contribution to the history of the Reformation period—on Luther, Calvin, Latimer, and Knox. 3. 'English Puritanism and its Leaders,' 1861, sketches of Cromwell, Baxter, and Bunyan. 4. 'Beginning Life: chapters for Young Men on Religion, Study, and Business,' 1862, which reached its eighth thousand within the year. 5. 'The Christ of the Gospels, and the Christ of Modern Criticism: Lectures on M. Renan's "Vie de Jésus,"' 1864, which criticises as irrelevant the method of the French biographer. 6. 'Rational Theology and Christian Philosophy in England in the Seventeenth Century,' 2 vols. 1872; 2nd edit. 1874; Tulloch's most important work, in which Haskland and his circle and the Cambridge Platonists are sympathetically treated, and little known regions of speculation illustrated. 7. 'The Christian Doctrine of Sin,' 1876, the Croall lecture. 8. 'Some Facts of Religion and of Life: Sermons preached before Her Majesty the Queen in Scotland, 1866-70,' 1877, with dedication to the queen. 9. 'Pascal,' in Blackwood's 'Foreign Classics for English Readers,' edited by Mrs. Oliphant, 1878. 10. 'Modern Theories in Philosophy and Religion,' 1884, a vigorous discussion of recent and contemporary speculations. 11. 'Movements of Religious Thought in Britain during the Nineteenth Century,' the fifth series of St. Giles's lectures, Edinburgh, 1886.

Tulloch was a steady contributor to current literature. He began with the Dundee papers, and in his ripper years he found in the 'Scotsman' a convenient medium for the expression of an urgent opinion. He wrote for the 'North British Review,' the 'British Quarterly Review,' 'Blackwood's Magazine,' the 'Contemporary Review,' the 'Nineteenth Century,' 'Good Words,' 'Fraser's Magazine,' and the 'Edinburgh Review.' Some of his magazine articles—such as his discussion of Mr. Lecky's 'History of Rationalism' in the fourth number of the 'Contemporary,' and his elaborate examination of Newman's 'Grammar of Assent' in the 'Edinburgh Review' of 1870—might well bear republication. To the ninth edition of the 'Encyclopædia Britannica,' besides various anonymous papers, such as that on the Devil (Mrs. OLIPHANT'S Memoir, p. 315), he contributed the articles on Arius, Athanasius, Augustine, Eusebius, Fénelon, the various Saints Francis, Gnosticism, Henry More, and Neander.

[Mrs. Oliphant's Memoir of Principal Tulloch, 1888; Scotsman, and other newspapers of 15 Feb. 1886; Dr. A. K. H. Boyd's Twenty-five Years of St. Andrews; Skelton's Table-Talk of Shirley; Scottish Church Magazine, vols. ii. and iii.; Blackwood's Magazine, 1886, vol. i.; Knight's Principal Shairp and his Friends; Alma Mater's Mirror, estimate by Dr. Menzies, and memorial Latin elegies by Bishop Wordsworth; personal knowledge.] T. B.

TULLY, THOMAS (1620-1676), divine, son of George Tully of Carlisle, was born in St. Mary's parish in that city on 22 July 1620. He was educated in the parish free school under John Winter, and afterwards at Barton Kirk in Westmoreland. He matriculated from Queen's College, Oxford, on 17 Oct. 1631, graduating B.A. on 4 July 1639, and M.A. on 1 Nov. 1642. He was elected a fellow of the college on 23 Nov. 1643 and admitted 25 March 1644. When Oxford was occupied by the parliamentarians he retired, and obtained the mastership of the grammar school of Tetbury in Oxfordshire. Returning to Oxford, he was admitted B.D. on 23 July 1657, and in the year following was appointed principal of St. Edmund Hall and rector of Grittleton in Wiltshire. After the Restoration he was created D.D. on 9 Nov. 1660, and nominated one of the royal chaplains in ordinary, and in April 1675 was appointed dean of Ripon. He died in the parsonage-house at Grittleton on 11 Jan. 1675-6. Tully's strict adherence to Calvinism, according to Wood, hindered his advancement.

He was the author of: 1. Trogon Apodeictica, sive Tractatus brevis et dilucidus de demonstratione; cum dissertatione de Gassendi eodem pertinente, Oxford, 1662, 8vo. 2. 'A Letter written to a Friend in Wilts upon occasion of a late ridiculous Pamphlet, wherein was inserted a pretended Prophecy of Thomas Becket's,' London, 1666, 4to. 3. Præcipuorum Theologicæ Capitum Enchiridion Didacticum, London, 1668, 8vo; Oxford, 1688, 8vo; Oxford, 1700, 8vo. 4. Justificatio Paulina sine Operibus, Oxford, 1674, 4to. This was a criticism of the 'Harmonia Apostolica' of George Bull [q. v.], bishop of St. David's. Tully also wrote several other controversial pamphlets against Richard Baxter and others. A French poem by him is printed in the Oxford volume of congratulations on Queen Mary's return from Holland (Oxford, 1643).

GEORGE TULLY or TULLIN (1652?-1695), possibly the nephew of Thomas, born in Carlisle about the end of 1652, was the son of Isaac Tully of Carlisle. He matriculated from Queen's College, Oxford, on 17 May 1670, graduating B.A. on 6 Feb. 1674-5, and M.A. on 1 July 1678, and was elected a fellow on 15 March 1678-9. He became chaplain to Richard Sterne [q. v.], archbishop of York, was appointed subdean in 1680, and a prebendary in 1681, was for a time preacher of St. Nicholas in Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and in 1691 was presented to the rectory of Gateshead in Durham, where he died on 21 April 1695, and was buried in the church, leaving a widow and two children.

Besides several sermons, he was the author of: 1. 'A Defence of the Confuter of Bellarmine's Second Note of the Church Antiquity against the Cavils of the Adviser,' London, 1687, 4to. 2. 'The Texts examined which Papists cite out of the Bible for the Proof of their Doctrine of Infallibility,' Oxford, 1687. 3. 'An Answer to a Discourse concerning the Celibacy of the Clergy,' Oxford, 1688, 4to. He also assisted to translate Plutarch's 'Morals' and the historical works of Suetonius and Cornelius Nepos (Wood, Athenæ Oxon. ed. Bliss, iv. 423).

[Wood's Athenæ Oxon. ed. Bliss, iii. 1055; Foster's Alumni Oxon. 1500-1714; Luttrell's Brief Relation, 1657, i. 381; Notes and Queries, 9th ser. iii. 201.] E. I. C.

TUNSTALL or TONSTALL, CUTHBERT (1474-1559), master of the rolls, and bishop successively of London and Durham, born in 1474, was the eldest and illegitimate son of Thomas Tunstall of Thurland Castle, Lancashire. The family had long been settled at Thurland Castle, which Cuthbert's grandfather, Sir Richard Tunstall, had lost by attainder in 1460 in consequence of his Lancastrian sympathies (Cal. Pat. Rolls, Edward IV, i. 383, 422 sq.). Cuthbert's mother is said to have been a member of the Conyers family (Leland, Itinerary, iv. 17; Surtees, Durham, vol. i. p. lxi; Whitaker, Richmondshire, ii. 271-4, where the inconsistencies of various Tunstall pedigrees are discussed; Wills of the Archdeaconry of Richmond, Surtees Soc. p. 288). He was born at Hackforth in the North Riding of Yorkshire, a parish in which the Tunstalls held land of Sir John Conyers (Cal. Inquis. post mortem, Henry VII, i. No. 675). His eldest surviving legitimate brother, Brian Tunstall, a noted soldier, inherited Thurland Castle, and was killed at Mudden Field on 9 Sept. 1513. He made Cuthbert supervisor of his will and guardian of his son Marmaduke, an arrangement which was confirmed by Henry VIII on 1 Aug. 1514 (Brian's will printed in WILLIAMS, ii. 273; cf. Letters and Papers of Henry VIII, vol. i. No. 5288).

Cuthbert was said by George Holland in 1563 to have been 'in his youth near two years brought up in my great-grandfather Sir Thomas Holland's kitchen unknown, 'till being known he was sent home to Sir Richard Tunstall his father [sic], and so kept at school, as he himself declared in manner the same to me' (BLOMFIELD, Norfolk, i. 232). About 1491 he entered Oxford University, matriculating, it is said, from Balliol College. An outbreak of the plague compelled him to leave, and he removed to King's Hall (afterwards merged in Trinity College), Cambridge. Subsequently he graduated LL.D. at Padua. He acquired, besides the ordinary scholastic and theological accomplishments, familiarity with Greek, Hebrew, mathematics, and civil law. Erasmus mentioned him as one of the men who did credit to Henry's court, and he enjoyed the friendship of Warham, More, and other leaders of the renaissance in England, as well as of foreign scholars like Beatus Rhenanus and Budæus (see ERASMUS, Epistolæ, 1612, pt. i. cols. 27, 120, 148, 172, 173, 400, 582, 783, 1158, 1509).

After his return to England, Tunstall was on 25 Dec. 1506 presented to the rectory of Barmston in Yorkshire, but he was not ordained subdeacon until 24 March 1509. He resigned Barmston before 26 March 1507, and in 1508 was collated to the rectory of Stanhope in the county of Durham. He also held the living of Aldridge in Staffordshire, which he resigned in 1509, being in that year collated to the rectory of Steeple Langford, Wiltshire (Letters and Papers of Henry VIII, i. 1007). On 25 Aug. 1511 Archbishop Warham appointed Tunstall his chancellor, and on 18 Dec. following gave him the rectory of Harrow-on-the-Hill. Warham also introduced him at court, and from this time his rise was rapid. On 15 April 1514 he received the prebend of Stow Lough, Lincoln Cathedral, in excision to Wolsey, and on 17 Nov. 1515 was admitted archdeacon of Chester. On 7 May he had been appointed ambassador at Brussels to Charles, prince of Castile, to negotiate a continuance of the treaties made between Henry VIII and Philip, late king of Castile (ib. ii. 422). He was also instructed to prevent Charles from forming a treaty with France, and these diplomatic tasks detained him most of the following year in the Netherlands (ib. vol. ii. passim; BROWNE, Hist. i. 65 et seq.). During his residence at Brussels he lodged with Erasmus; but his mission was unsuccessful, and, according to his colleague, Sir Thomas More, not much to his taste (More to Erasmus, Epistolæ, ii. 16). On 12 May 1516 he was made master of the rolls. On 15 Oct. 1518 he was present at Greenwich at the betrothal of the king's daughter Mary to the dauphin of France, and delivered an oration in praise of matrimony, which was printed by Pynson in the same year as 'O. Tunstalli in Laudem Matrimonii Oratio,' London, 4to; a second edition was printed at Basle in 1519. In the latter year Tunstall became prebendary of Rotovant in York Cathedral, and was again sent as ambassador to Charles V's court at Cologne. He returned to England in August 1520, but left again in September, and was at Worms during the winter of 1520-1. In his letters he gave an account of the spread of Lutheranism in Germany, and he earnestly urged Erasmus to write against that heresy (ib. i. col. 759). He returned to England in April, and in May was appointed dean of Salisbury, receiving about the same time the prebends of Combe and Hornham in that cathedral. In 1522 he was papally provided to the bishopric of London, the temporalities being restored on 5 July. On 25 May 1523 he was appointed keeper of the privy seal, and he delivered the king's speech at the opening of parliament in that year.

In April 1525 Tunstall was once more appointed ambassador, with Sir Richard Wingfield [q. v.], to Charles V (Stowe MS. 147, ff. 67, 81). He left Cowes on 18 April, and reached Toledo on 24 May. Francis I had been captured at Pavia, and Tunstall was entrusted with a proposal for the dismemberment of France and the exclusion of Francis I and his son from the French throne. It is, however, doubtful whether Wolsey was in earnest, and Charles V was not in the least likely to fall in with these schemes. He was equally reluctant to carry out his engagement to marry the Princess Mary, and as a result Wolsey accepted the French offers of peace, Tunstall returned to England through France in January 1526. Later in the year he was engaged in a visitation of his diocese, and his prohibition of Simon Fish's 'Supplication for the Beggars,' Tyndale's 'New Testament,' and other heretical books, is printed in 'Four Supplications' (Early English Text Soc. pp. x-xi). In 1527 he accompanied Wolsey on his embassy to France, and in the following years was one of the plenipotentiaries who negotiated the famous treaty of Cambray (Letters and Papers, vol. iv. pt. iii. passim).

In the divorce question, which now became acute, Tunstall was said to have been one of those who would have been entirely on the emperor's side had it not been for Wolsey's influence, and Catherine chose him as one of her counsel; but he used his influence to dissuade her from appealing to Rome. On 21 Feb. 1529-80 he was papally provided to the bishopric of Durham in succession to Wolsey, who had held the see in commendam with the archbishopric of York. Temporary custody of the temporalities was granted him on 4 Feb., and plenary restitution was made on 25 March; he was succeeded in the bishopric of London by his friend and ally, John Stokesley [q. v.] Throughout the ensuing ecclesiastical revolution Tunstall's attitude was one of 'invincible moderation.' He retained till his death unshaken belief in catholic dogma, and he opposed with varying resolution all measures calculated to destroy it; but at the same time he seems to have believed in 'passive obedience' to the civil power, and even under Edward VI carried out ecclesiastical changes when sanctioned by parliament which he opposed before their enactment. Thus he protested against Henry VIII's assumption of the title of 'supreme head' even with the saving clause about the rights of the church (WILKINS, Concilia, vol. iii.; cf. Stowe MS. 141, f. 86), but he subsequently adopted it without reservation, remonstrated with Cardinal Pole on his attitude towards the royal supremacy, preached against the pope's authority in his diocese, and was selected to preach on Quinquagesima Sunday 1538 before four Carthusian monks condemned to death for refusing the oath of supremacy (WRIOTHESLEY, Chron. i. 34). He maintained it also in a sermon preached before the king on Palm Sunday 1539, which was published by Berthelet in the same year (London, 8vo), and reissued in 1633 (London, 4to). Tunstall's acquiescence in this and the other measures which completed the severance between the English church and Rome was of material service to Henry VIII, for, after the death of Warham and Fisher, Tunstall was beyond doubt the most widely respected of English bishops. Polo wrote in 1536 to Gilbert that Tunstall was then considered the greatest of English scholars (Cal. State Papers, Veuetian, 1534-54, No. 116). His influence was, however, occasionally feared by Henry, and previous to the parliament of 1536 which sanctioned the dissolution of the lesser monasteries, Tunstall was prevented from attending it, first by a letter from Henry excusing him from being present on account of his age, and secondly, when Tunstall was already near London, by a peremptory order from Cromwell to return (GASQUET, Henry VIII and the Monasteries, i. 151, 294).

In 1537 Tunstall was provided with a fresh field of activity by being appointed president of the newly created council of the north (State Papers, i. 554), and his voluminous correspondence in this capacity is now in the British Museum (Addit. MSS. 32647-32648). He was frequently appointed on commissions to treat with the Scots, and acted generally as experienced adviser to the successive lieutenant-generals appointed by Henry to defend the borders or invade Scotland. He continued, however, to take an active part in religious matters, and in 1537 he, as one of the commissioners appointed to draw up the 'Institution of a Christian Man,' endeavoured to make it as catholic in tone as possible. In 1538 he examined John Lambert (d. 1538) [q. v.] on the corporeal presence in the eucharist, and in the following year he submitted to Henry arguments in favour of auricular confession as of divine origin (the manuscript, with criticisms on the margin in Henry's own hand, is extant in Cottonian MS. Cleopatra E, v. 125). He attended the parliament of that year, which passed the act of six articles, asserting among other dogmas that auricular confession was 'agreeable to the word of God,' and in 1541 was published the 'great bible' in English, which was 'overseene and perused' by Tunstall and Nicholas Heath [q. v.] For the next few years Tunstall was chiefly occupied on the borders; in 1544 he was stationed at Newcastle during Hertford's invasion of Scotland. In November 1545 he was commissioned to negotiate peace with France (State Papers, x. 688), and in the following June was again sent to France to receive the ratification of the treaty of Ardres (ib.; Corr. Pol. de Odet de Selve, pp. 3-6). He returned in August, and attended the parliament that was sitting when Henry VIII died on 28 Jan. 1546-7.

During Edward VI's reign Tunstall's position became increasingly difficult, but his friendly relations with Somerset and Cramer, combined with his own moderation, saved him at first from the consequences of his antipathy to their religious policy. He had been appointed by Henry VIII one of the executors to his will, concurred in the elevation of Somerset to the protectorate, and officiated at Edward VI's coronation (20 Feb. 1546-7). He took, however, no part in the deprivation of Lord-chancellor Wriotheesley, the leading catholic in the council, and, though he was included in the privy council as reconstituted in March, he does not seem to have abetted the measures by which Somerset rendered himself independent of its authority. He attended various meetings of the council until illness incapacitated him, and on 12 April he was directed, owing to news of the aggressive designs of the new French king, Henry II, to proceed to the borders and take up his duties as president of the council of the north (Acts P. C. ed. Vassett, ii. 475). During the summer he was busily engaged in putting the borders in a state of defence and in making preparations for Somerset's invasion. On 8 July, as a last effort for peace, he was commissioned to meet the Scots' envoys at Berwick; but they failed to appear, and the Scots' attack on Laughton caused the council to revoke Tunstall's commission (Acts P. C. ii. 515; Sneyd, pp. 160, 163).

Tunstall's compliance with the ecclesiastical proceedings of the council provoked a complaint from Gardiner in the spring of 1547, but in the parliament which met in November he voted against both the bills for the abolition of chantries (Lords' Journals, 15 and 23 Dec.). He seems, however, to have acquiesced in a bill 'for the administration of the sacrament.' He was not included in the famous Windsor commission appointed in the following year to amend the offices of the church, and in the parliament of November he took a prominent part on the catholic side in the debates on the sacrament and on the ritual recommendations of the commission (Royal MS. 17 B. xxix; Gasquet and Bishop, Edward VI and the Common Prayer). He voted against the act of uniformity and the act enabling priests to marry (Lords' Journals, 15 Jan. and 19 Feb. 1548-9). Nevertheless, after the act of uniformity had been passed, Tunstall enforced its provisions in his diocese. He took no part in the overthrow of Somerset in October 1549, but attended parliament in the following November, and sat on a committee of the House of Lords appointed to devise a measure for the restoration of episcopal authority. He also attended the privy council from December to February 1549-50, and on 5 March was directed to repair to Berwick in view of a threatened Scottish invasion (Acts P. C. ii. 406).

But the hope that the catholics who had aided Warwick in the deposition of Somerset would be able to reverse his religious policy proved vain, and Tunstall, like the other catholics, soon found himself in a difficult position. In September 1550 he was accused by Ninian Monville, a Scot, of encouraging a rebellion in the north and a Scottish invasion. The precise nature of the accusation never transpired, and it is probable that the real causes of the proceedings against him were his friendship for Somerset, sympathy with his endeavours to check Warwick's persecution of the catholics, and Warwick's plans for dissolving the bishopric of Durham and erecting on its ruins an impregnable position for himself on the borders. On 15 May 1551 he was summoned to London (Cal. State Papers, Dom. 1547-80, p. 83), and on the 20th was confined to his house 'by Coldharbour in Thames Street' (Acts P. C. iii. 277; Wriotheesley, ii. 65). During his enforced leisure he composed his 'De Veritate Corporis et Sanguinis Domini nostri Jesu Christi in Eucharistia,' perhaps the best contemporary statement of the catholic doctrine of the eucharist. It was completed in 1551, the author being then, as he states, in his seventy-seventh year. Canon Dixon asserts that it was published in the same year, but the fact is extremely improbable, and no copy of such an edition has been traced. The first known edition was issued at Paris in 1554; a second edition appeared at Paris in the same year. On 5 Oct. 1551 Cecil and Sir John Mason [q.v.] were directed to examine Tunstall, probably with the object of obtaining evidence against Somerset, whose arrest had already been arranged. Nothing resulted from the inquiry, but some weeks later a letter from Tunstall to Ninian Monville, containing, it is said, the requisite evidence of his treason, was found in a casket belonging to Somerset. On 20 Dec. he was consequently removed to the Tower, and Northumberland determined to proceed against him in the approaching session of parliament. On 28 March 1552 a bill for his deprivation was introduced into the House of Lords; it passed its third reading, and was sent down to the commons on the 31st. There, being described as 'a bill against this bishop of Durham for misprision of treason,' it was read a first time on 4 April. But, in spite of Northumberland's elaborate efforts to pack it, the House of Commons showed many signs of independence, and before proceeding further demanded the attendance of the bishop 'and his accessories.' This was apparently refused, and the bill fell through. Tunstall, was, however, detained in the Tower, and subsequently in the king's bench prison, and on 21 Sept. 1552 the chief justice and other laymen were commissioned to try him. He was tried at the Whitefriars on Tower Hill on 1 and 5 Oct., and deprived on the 14th of his bishopric, which was dissolved by act of parliament in March 1552-3.

Queen Mary's accession was followed on 8 Aug. 1553 by Tunstall's release from the king's bench; an act of parliament was passed in April 1554 re-establishing the bishopric of Durham, and declaring that its suppression had been brought about by 'the sinister labour, great malice, and corrupt means of certain ambitious persons being then in authority.' Tunstall was restored to it, and was himself placed on commissions for depriving Hoolgate, Ferrar, Taylor, Hooper, Harley, and other bishops. He also sought to convert various prisoners in the Tower condemned to death for heresy, but he refused the request of Cranmer, who had studied Tunstall's book, 'De Veritate Corporis,' in prison, to confer with him, saying that Cranmer was more likely to shake him than be convinced by him. He took part in the reception of Cardinal Pole on 24 Nov. 1554, but he refrained as far as possible from persecuting the protestants, and condemned none of them to death. Immediately after her accession Elizabeth wrote to Tunstall on 19 Dec. 1558, disposing with his services in parliament and at her coronation. He refused to take the oath of supremacy, and was summoned to London, where he arrived on 20 July 1559, lodging 'with one Dolman, a fallow chandler in Southwark' (MACHYN, p. 201). On 19 Aug. he wrote to Cecil, saying he could not consent to the visitation of his diocese if it extended to pulling down altars, defacing churches, and taking away crucifixes; but on 9 Sept. he was ordered to consecrate Matthew Parker as archbishop of Canterbury. He refused, and on the 28th he was deprived, in order, says Machyn, that 'he should not receive the rentes for that quarter' (Diary, p. 214). He was committed to the custody of Parker, who treated him with every consideration at Lambeth Palace. He died there on 18 Nov., and was buried in the palace chapel on the following day. A memorial inscription, composed by Walter Haddon [q.v.], is printed in Stow's 'Survey' (ed. Strype, App. i. 85) and in Ducarel's 'Lambeth' (App., p. 40). A portrait of Tunstall was lent in 1868 by Mr. J. Darcy Hinton to the National Art Exhibition at Leeds (THORNBURY, Yorkshire Worthies, p. 4). An engraving by Fordriner is given in Fiddes's 'Life of Wolsey.'

Tunstall's long career of eighty-five years, for thirty-seven of which he was a bishop, is one of the most consistent and honourable in the sixteenth century. The extent of the religious revolution under Edward VI caused him to reverse his views on the royal supremacy, and he refused to change them again under Elizabeth. His dislike of persecution is illustrated by his conduct in 1527, when he put himself to considerable expense to buy up and burn all available copies of Tyndale's Testament, in order to avoid the necessity of burning heretics. In Mary's reign he dismissed a protestant preacher with the words, 'Hitherto we have had a good report among our neighbours; I pray you bring not this poor man's blood upon my head.'

Besides the works already mentioned, Tunstall wrote: 1. 'De Arte Supputandi libri quattuor,' London, R. Pynson, 1522, 4to; other editions, Paris, 1529, 4to; Paris, 1538, 4to; and Strasburg, 1551, 8vo. 2. 'Contra Blasphematores Dei predestinationis opus,' Antwerp, 1555, 8vo. 3. 'Certaine Godly and Devout Prayers made in Latin by . . . Cuthbert Tunstall,' London, 1558, 12mo [cf. art. PAYNELL, THOMAS]. He also wrote a preface to Saint Ambrose's 'Expositio super Apocalypsim,' London, 1554, 4to. [For his epistle to Pole, written in conjunction with Stokesley, see art. STOKESLEY, JOHN.]

[Tunstall's Works in British Museum Library, and correspondence in Cotton. MSS. passim, and Addit. MSS. 5758, 6237, 25114, 32647-8, 32654, 32657; Land. MSS. 982, ff. 291, 294, 296; State Papers Henry VIII, 11 vols.; Letters and Papers, ed. Brewer and Guindar. 15 vols.; Cal. State Papers, Domestic, Scottish (ed. Thorpe, 1858, and ed. Bain, 1898), Spanish, Venetian, and Foreign Ser.; Rymer's Fœdera; Wilkins's Concilia; Lords' and Commons' Journals; Statutes of the Realm; Erasmii Epistolæ, ed. 1642; Pole's Epistolæ; Acts of the Privy Council, ed. Nicolas, vol. vii. and ed. Denton, vols. i-vii.; Corr. Pol. de Marillac et de Selve; Hamilton Papers, vols. i. and ii.; Sadler State Papers; Ellis's Original Letters; Lodge's Illustrations; Lit. Remains of Edward VI (Roxburghe Club); Wriothesley's Chron., Machyn's Diary, Chron. of Queen Jane (Camden Soc.); Gough's Index to Parker Soc. Publ.; Leland's Encornia, 1586, p. 45; Strype's Works (general index); Hayward's Edward VI; Fuller's Church Hist.; Heylyn's and Burnet's Histories of the Reformation; Foxe's Acts and Monuments, ed. Townsend; Le Neve's Fasti Eccl. ed. Hardy; Newcourt's Repertorium and Honnessy's Novum Rep. 1898; Maitland's Essays on the Reformation; Dixon's Hist. of the Church of England; Lingard and Froude's Histories; Biographia Britannica, s.v. 'Tunstall'; Tanner's Bibliotheca Brit.-Hib.; Collect. Dunelm.; Wood's Athenæ, i. 303; Cooper's Athens Cantabr. i. 193; Foss's Lives of the Judges; Surtees's Durham; Whitker's Richmondshire; Baines's Lancashire, iv. 616; Geo's Elizabethan Clergy, 1898.]

A. F. P.

TUNSTALL, JAMES (1708-1762), divine and classical scholar, son of James Tunstall, an attorney at Richmond in Yorkshire, was born about 1708. He was educated at Slaidburn grammar school under Bradbury, and was admitted a sizar at St. John's College, Cambridge, on 29 June 1724, when past sixteen, being partly maintained at the university by an uncle. He graduated B.A. in 1727, M.A. in 1731, B.D. in 1738, and D.D. on 13 July 1741. To the university collection of poems on the accession of George II he contributed a set of Greek verses, and his act for the doctor's degree was much applauded. On 24 March 1738-9 he was elected to a fellowship at his college, and ultimately became its senior dean and one of the two principal tutors. He was famous 'as a pupil monger,' both as regards his classical knowledge and his kindness of manners (WHITAKER, Whalley, ed. 1818, p. 417).

Tunstall, on the presentation of Edward, second earl of Oxford, was instituted on 4 Dec. 1739 to the rectory of Sturmer in Essex, and held it until early in 1746 (MORANT, Essex, ii. 317). In October 1741 he was elected to the post of public orator at Cambridge, polling 160 votes against 187 recorded for Philip Yonge, afterwards bishop of Norwich (OODER, Annals of Cambr. iv. 314), and was allowed to hold it, though absent from the university, until 1746, when his grace for a continuance of the permission was refused. This absence was caused by his appointment about 1743 as domestic chaplain to Potter, the archbishop of Canterbury.

The archbishop offered Tunstall in 1744 the rectory of Saltwood in Kent, but it was declined. He accepted, however, the vicarage of Minster in the Isle of Thanet (collated 12 Feb. 1746-7), and the rectory of Great Chart, near Ashford in Kent (collated 6 March 1746-7), each of which was worth about 200*l.* per annum (HASTED, Kent, iii. 251, 410, iv. 332). He had become a senior fellow of his college on 12 Nov. 1746, but in consequence of these preferments he vacated his fellowship in February 1747-8. From 1746 to his death he was treasurer and canon residentiary of St. David's.

Tunstall married, about 1750, Elizabeth, daughter of John Dodsworth of Thornton Watlas, Yorkshire, by his wife Henrietta, daughter of John Hutton of Marsko, and sister of Matthew Hutton, successively archbishop of York and Canterbury. On the nomination of this archbishop he was collated on 11 Nov. 1757 to the vicarage of Rochdale, which was considered to be worth about 800*l.* a year. It fell short of that sum, and it was not the preferment that he longed for, his desire being to obtain a prebendal stall at Canterbury. He died, disappointed of his wish and in poor circumstances, at the house of a brother in Mark Lane, London, on 28 March 1762, and was buried in the chancel of St. Peter, Cornhill, on 2 April. His widow moved to Hadleigh in Suffolk, and died there on 5 Dec. 1772, in her forty-ninth year. A marble slab to her memory is at the west end of the north aisle. Seven daughters at least survived him. The three that were living in 1772 were sent to Lisbon for their health. Henrietta Maria, the second, married, on 14 June 1775, John Croft, merchant at Oporto, and was mother of Sir John Croft, bart. [see CROFT, JOHN], chargé d'affaires at Lisbon; Catherine, the sixth daughter, married, first, the Rev. Edward Chamberlayne, and secondly, Horatio, lord Walpole, afterwards second earl of Oxford; Jane, the seventh daughter, married, first, Stephen Thompson, and secondly, Sir Edward Hume [q.v.]

In 1711 Tunstall printed in Latin: 1. 'Epistola ad virum eruditum Conyers Middleton,' in which he made a 'learned and spirited attack' on that writer's life of Cicero by questioning the genuineness of Cicero's letters to Brutus, which Middleton had accepted without reserve. Middleton retorted very sharply in 'The Epistles of Cicero to Brutus, and of Brutus to Cicero' (1718), claiming to have vindicated their authenticity and to have confuted all his critic's objections. Tunstall promptly replied in 2. 'Observations on the present Collection of Epistles between Cicero and Brutus, in answer to the late pretences of the Rev. Dr. Middleton' (1744), and in the next year Jeremiah Markland confirmed his view. The verdict of most scholars is now against Middleton. Tunstall advertised a new edition of Cicero's letters to Pomponius Atticus and to his brother Quintus, and he brought up with him to London in 1762 his annotations on the first three books of the letters. They were offered to Bowyer, who declined to take them until the whole copy was ready. A week or two later Tunstall died (PAGAN, Anonymiana, Century iv. 98).

Tunstall's other works were: 3. 'Sermon before House of Commons,' 1746. 4. 'Vindication of Power of States to prohibit clandestine Marriages, particularly those of Minors,' 1755. 5. 'Marriage in Society stated,' 1755. Both of those productions were in answer to treatises of Henry Stebbing (1687-1763) [q. v.], and were caused by the passing of the marriage act of 1753. 6. 'Academica. Part I. Several Discourses on Natural and Revealed Religion,' 1759. 7. 'Lectures on Natural and Revealed Religion read in the Chapel of St. John's College, Cambridge,' 1765. They were published by subscription for the benefit of his family, and were edited by his brother-in-law, Frederick Dodsworth, afterwards canon of Windsor, who acted as a father to the children.

Tunstall gave critical annotations to the first edition of Duncombe's Horace, and obtained Warburton's notes on Hudibras for Zachary Grey. Letters from him to the second Earl of Oxford, Dr. Birch, and Zachary Grey are among the additional manuscripts at the British Museum (4958, 4800, and 3890 respectively). He was a friend and correspondent of Warburton (Nichols, Illustrations of Literature, ii. 108, 124-5, 129), and his letters to Grey are printed in that work (iii. 704-5, iv. 372-4). His other friends included Thomas Baker 'Socius ejectus' and John Byrom the poet. His library was sold in 1764, and 152 manuscript sermons by him passed to Sir Everard Hoare.

[Nichols's Illustr. of Lit. iii. 703; Nichols's Literary Anecd. ii. 166-70, iii. 668, v. 412-13; Byrom's Remains, ii. 1. 42; Notes and Queries, 8th ser. xi. 85, 131; Mayor's Baker, i. 304, 306, 329; Masters's Memoir of Baker, pp. 83, 114-115; Vicars of Rochdale (Chetham Soc. i. now ser.) pp. 182-97; Pigot's Hadleigh, pp. 211-213; Fishwick's Rochdale, pp. 237-8; Le Neve's Fæsti, i. 318, in. 614, iv. 372-4; Foster's Yorkshire Pedigrees, sub 'Croft' and 'Dodsworth'; information from Mr. R. F. Scott, St. John's Coll. Cambridge.] W. P. G.

TUNSTALL, MARMADUKE (1748-1790), naturalist, born in 1748 at Burton Constable, Yorkshire, was second son of Outhbert Constable (who had changed his name from Tunstall on inheriting property in 1718, and who died in 1747), by his second wife, Ely, daughter of George Henenge, of Hainton, Lincolnshire. He was educated at the college of Douai. In 1760 he succeeded to the family estates of Scargill, Hutton Long Villers, and Wycliffe by the death of his uncle, Marmaduke Tunstall, and resumed that family name. Of studious habits, he devoted himself to literature and science, and in 1764, when only twenty-one, was elected a fellow of the Society of Antiquaries. After finishing his education he resided for several years in Welbeck Street, London, and there began the formation of a museum. He was elected a fellow of the Royal Society on 11 April 1771, and in the same year published anonymously his 'Ornithologia Britannica' (fol. London), a rare work, which has been reprinted by the Willughby Society.

In 1776, on his marriage with the daughter and coheir of Mr. Markham of Roxby, Lincolnshire, he removed to his house at Wycliffe, Yorkshire, and thither his collections were afterwards transferred. Here he was on most intimate terms with a fellow-naturalist, Thomas Zouch, the incumbent of Wycliffe, despite the fact that he had opposed Zouch's presentation to the benefice, of which, although a Roman catholic, Tunstall was patron. He lived a quiet and retired life, corresponding with various naturalists, including Linné.

He died suddenly at Wycliffe Hall on 11 Oct. 1790, leaving no issue, and was buried in the chancel of his own church. His widow died in October 1825.

Besides the 'Ornithologia Britannica' he published 'An Account of several Lunar Iris' (or rainbows) for the 'Philosophical Transactions' in 1788.

His museum was purchased by George Allan [q. v.] of Grange, near Darlington, and passed with the latter's collections into the hands of the Literary and Philosophical Society of Newcastle-on-Tyne in 1822.

[Fox's Synopsis of the Newcastle Museum, 1827 (biogr. with portrait and engraving of the coat-of-arms, showing thirty-five quarterings); Genl. Mag. 1790, ii. 959; pref. to Willughby Society's reprint of the Ornithologia Britannica.]

B. B. W.

TUNSTALL or HELMES, THOMAS (z. 1616), Roman catholic martyr, was collaterally descended from the Tunstalls of Thurland Castle, who subsequently moved to Scargill, Yorkshire. The family remained staunch Roman catholics, and several of its members entered the Society of Jesus, adopting Scargill as their name (Douai Diaries, passim). Thomas was probably born at Kendal, being described in the Douai registers as 'Carliolensis' and 'Kendallensis.' He was matriculated under the name Helmes at Douai on 7 Oct. 1607, was ordained priest in 1609, and sent as missionary to England in 1610 (ib. pp. 19, 84, 287). He was a secular priest, not a jesuit, and subsequently made a vow to enter the Benedictine order. Shortly after his arrival in England he was arrested, and he spent four or five years in various prisons, the last of them being Wisbech Castle. From this he escaped by means of a rope, but cut his hands severely, and applied to the wife of Sir Hamo L'Estrange, who was skilled in dressing wounds. Her suspicions of his identity were raised, and she mentioned the matter to her husband, a justice of the peace, who ordered Tunstall's arrest. He was conveyed to Norwich to stand his trial at the quarter sessions, was condemned to death for high treason on the testimony of one witness who is said to have committed perjury, and on 13 July 1616 was hanged, drawn, and quartered on the gallows outside Magdalen Gates, Norwich. His head was, at his own request, placed over St. Bennet's gate. A portrait of Tunstall was given by Canon Raine to Stonyhurst College (RAINE, Depositions from York Castle, p. 44). Two of Tunstall's nephews—William (1611–1681), rector of Ghent; and Thomas (1612–1611)—were well-known Jesuits (FOLBY, Records, vii. 784–5).

[Exemplar Litterarum a quodam sacerdote collegii Anglorum Duaceni . . . de Martyriis quatuor eiusdem collegii, Douai, 1617; Histoire véritable du martyre de trois prestres du collège de Douay, Paris, 1617; Blomefield's Norfolk, iii. 366; Dod's Church Hist. ii. 382; Foloy's Records S. J., v. 690–2, vii. 784–5; Challouer's Modern Brit. Martyrology, 1836, ii. 64–8.]

A. F. P.

TUNSTED, SIMON (d. 1309), Minorite friar and miscellaneous writer, was born at Norwich, his father being a native of Tunstead, whence the surname was derived. Simon entered the community of Greyfriars at Norwich, distinguished himself by learning and piety, and was made doctor of theology. According to Blomefield, he was afterwards warden of the Franciscan convent at Norwich. In 1351 he was the regent master of the Minorites in Oxford, and finally about 1360 became the twenty-ninth minister provincial over the whole English branch of the order. He died and was buried in the monastery of Brimsyard, Suffolk, in 1309 (LITTLE, Greyfriars at Oxford, p. 241).

Lohud, who calls him Donostadius, ascribes to him only a commentary on the 'Meteora' of Aristotle; Bale mentions two other works, additions to the 'Albeon' of Richard of Wallingford, and 'Quatuor Principalia Musicae.' 'Albeon' was an astronomical instrument. Tunsted improved both the instrument and its inventor's description (Laud MSS. Miscell. 567). The only ground for ascribing the musical treatise to Tunsted is the colophon, dated August 1361: 'Ille autem anno regens erat inter Minores Oxonie frater Simon de Tūstede, doctor sacre theologie, qui in musica pollebat, eciam in septem artibus liberalibus.' Three copies are known: two in the Bodleian Library (Bodleian MS. 615; Digby MS. 90), and one in the British Museum (Addit. MS. 8866, with the 'Summa' of John Hanboys).

Each of these three copies has given rise to inaccuracies of description. Bale evidently knew this British Museum manuscript, but did not notice that it contained two works, and quoted the opening words 'Quasmodum inter triticum ac zizanium' as the beginning of Hanboys's treatise. Tanner followed Bale in this, altering the date to 1451; and Hawkins (History of Music, ch. 52 n. 51 n. 57, 66) copies Tanner, and formally ascribes 'Quatuor Principalia Musicae,' written in 1451, to Hanboys. Tanner partially corrected his mistake in writing of Tunsted. Worse confusion has been occasioned by mistakes concerning the Oxford manuscripts. In Bernard's catalogus (Oxford 1807) the Bodleian manuscript is described as 'De Musica continua et discretiva cum diagrammatibus,' the Digby manuscript receives its correct title, followed by 'quem edidit Oxonie Thomas de Teukesbury A.D. 1651,' a mistake suggested by the memorandum on the first page that the manuscript was presented to the Oxford Minorites 1388 by John de Towkesbury, with the assent of the minister provincial, Thomas Kyngesbury [q. v.] Wood fell into the same mistake. 'Thomas de Teukesbury' (or Joannes de Teukesbury) has been frequently alluded to as a mediæval musical theorist; an anonymous work in Digby MS. 17 was ascribed to him, and was announced for publication by Coussemaker, who subsequently regretted he could not find room for it. The differing titles given by Bernard naturally suggested that Tunsted wrote two different treatises; but the only material variation is that the Digby manuscript omits a short prologus, with which the other copies begin. Burney corrected this mistake after examining the two Oxford manuscripts; yet it has been repeated by Onselny (in the English edition of NAWMANN'S Illustrirte Geschichte der Musik, p. 561) and Fétis. In Ravenscroft's 'Briefs Discourse of . . . Mensurable Musick' (1614), a treatise by John Dunstable is often quoted; but the quotations so exactly coincide with the last of the 'Quatuor Principalia' that it is probable Dunstable's supposed treatise (otherwise quite unknown) was really this.

'Quatuor Principalia Musicae' was printed as Tunsted's in Coussemaker's 'Scriptores de Musica mediævi' (vol. iv.), but the last section had previously appeared separately as an anonymous work in vol. iii., the chapters being there divided differently. The grounds for ascribing it to Tunsted are admittedly insufficient; and internal evidence points to the author being a foreigner either by birth or education. He calls Philippus de Vitriaco 'flos musicorum totius mundi,' and quotes his motets. The first of the 'Principalia' is speculative; the second deals with the elements of music, the construction of the monochord, and intervals; the third, with notation and plain song; the fourth and most important being devoted to mensurable music. The work is clearly and practically written, and is unsurpassed in value by any of the mediæval treatises, except perhaps Walter Odington's. It was quoted in Lansdowne MS. 768, written at Waltham Abbey in the fifteenth century; and an epitome of the second 'Principale' is in Addit. MS. 10386, written at New College in 1500. Morley in 1597 included it in his list of treatises, but without an author's name. It is often quoted in H. Riemann's 'Studien zur Geschichte der Notenschrift,' sects. 8 and 9.

[Blomefield's History of Norfolk, iv. 113; Leland's Commentarii de Scriptoribus Britannicis, p. 387; Cat. of Manuscripts in Cambridge University Library, iv. 182; Coxe's Cat. of Manuscripts in the Bodleian Library; Bale's Scriptores Britannicis, p. 473; Pitæus, Scriptorum Catalogus, p. 502; Tanner's Catalogus, pp. 378, 725; Burney's History of Music, ii. 209, 394; Weale's Descriptive Catalogue of the Loan Exhibition of 1885, p. 122; Nagel's Geschichte der Musik in England, i. 62, 139; Davoy's History of English Music, pp. 37-40, 209.]

II. D.

TUPPER, MARTIN FARQUHAR (1810-1889), author of 'Proverbial Philosophy,' born at 20 Devonshire Place, Marylebone, on 17 July 1810, was the eldest son of Dr. Martin Tupper, F.R.S. (d. 8 Dec. 1844, aged 66), a well-known physician of New Burlington Street, who was twice offered a baronetcy, first by Lord Liverpool and then by the Duke of Wellington (Gent. Mag. 1845, i. 106). The poet's mother was Ellen Devis, niece of Arthur William Devis [q. v.] and daughter of Robert Marris, a landscape-painter and a native of Lincolnshire; she died in 1847. The Tupper family is of an old Huguenot stock known as Tüpper in Germany, Tonpard in France and the Netherlands, and Tupper in England and America. Representatives of the family were exiled by Charles V from Heese-Cassel for their protestant opinions about 1622. Of these, Henry Tupper settled at Ochester, and his son John, a direct ancestor of the poet, died in possession of a small estate in Guernsey in 1601. This John's grandson distinguished himself by giving such information at Spithead on 16 May 1692 as led to the victory at La Hogue, and received a massive gold chain and a medal from William III (for the rare medal by James Roettier, see Medallist Hist. 1885, ii. 64; grant of arms to John Elisha Tupper, 1826, ap. Misc. Gen. et Herald., new ser. ii. 1). A younger brother of John Tupper, the hero of 1692, held a naval commission under William III, and was grandfather of John Tupper of the Pollett, Guernsey, the father of Dr. Martin Tupper.

Of the senior branch of the Tupperes who remained in Guernsey, a large number have distinguished themselves in the army and navy. Among these the most noteworthy were Lieutenant Carré Tupper, a gallant young officer who was killed at Bastia on 24 April 1794 (see United Service Journal, 1840, pp. 174, 341); Lieutenant William Tupper of H.M.S. Sybille, mortally wounded in an action with Greek pirates on 18 June 1826; Colonel William de Vic Tupper, who entered the Chilean service and was slain in action at Talca on 17 April 1830; Colonel William Le Mesurier Tupper, who served with the British Legion in Spain and was mortally wounded at St. Sebastian on 5 May 1836; and General John Tupper, who served at Quiberon under Hawke in 1759, was a colonel under Rodney on 12 April 1782, and was commandant-in-chief of the marines at the time of his death on 30 Jan. 1795 (Gent. Mag. 1795, i. 173). Of the American branches, besides several missionaries of note, Tupperes distinguished themselves on either side at Bunker Hill, and one of them was thanked by Washington in general orders. Sir Charles Tupper, the Canadian statesman, is a descendant of the loyalist soldier (DR HAVILLAND, Genealogical Sketches; Mag. of American History, October 1889; DUNCAN, History of Guernsey, 1841; THIBAULT, Sir Charles Tupper).

After education at Charterhouse (1821-6), Martin Farquhar matriculated from Christ Church, Oxford, on 21 May 1828, and graduated B.A. 1832 and M.A. 1835. In 1831 he won Dr. Burton's theological essay prize, Gladstone standing second. He entered Lincoln's Inn on 18 Jan. 1832, and was called to the bar in 1835, but never practised as a barrister. In 1832 appeared his first work, 'Sacra Poesia,' which is now sought by the curious, and in 1838 'Geraldine'—a 'sequel to Christabel' (see Blackwood's Mag. December 1838). In the same year the first part of 'Proverbial Philosophy' was written in his chambers at 21 Old Square, Lincoln's Inn. Some fragments had been written as early as 1827. The original edition of 1838 attained a very moderate success, while its first appearance in America was almost a failure. It was quoted by Willis in the 'Home Journal' on the supposition that it was the forgotten work of a seventeenth-century writer; but the style with its queer inversions bears more resemblance to the English of an erudite German of the nineteenth century. The demand for the 'Proverbial Philosophy' increased rapidly, and for twenty-five years there were never fewer than five thousand copies sold annually in England. The work was expanded into four series (1839-76), of which the earlier went through between fifty and sixty editions. It was translated into German and Danish, and into French verse by G. Métivier in 1861. In the illustrated quarto edition of 1881 it is stated that a million copies had been dispersed in America, and a quarter of that number in Great Britain. Vast numbers of fairly educated middle-class people perused these singular rhythmical effusions with genuine enthusiasm, and thought that Tupper had eclipsed Solomon. Clever parodies by Cuthbert Bede and others appeared (cf. Punch, 1842; Donson, The New Belfry of Christ Church, 1872, sect. 13), and the book was ably and savagely reviewed in 'Fraser' (October 1862) and elsewhere. Tupper persuaded himself that the literary critics who decried his work were a malicious and discredited faction. Yet in due time 'Martin Tupper' became a synonym for contemptible commonplace.

None of Tupper's other works caught the popular taste, but among them may be noted his 'War Ballads' (1854), 'Rifle Ballads' (1859), 'Protestant Ballads' (1874), and the 'Rides and Reveries of Mr. Æsop Smith, edited by Peter Query, Esq.' (1857), a vigorous and unsparing criticism of 'wicked wives, bad servants, dull parsons, hypocritical mercy-mongers and zoilistical critics.' Tupper was of a chivalrous nature, and his feelings sometimes ran away with his judgment; yet he led a forlorn hope in many movements that have since won success. Thus his American and Canadian 'Ballads' tended to promote international kindness between England and the United States of America; his 'Rifle Ballads' gave a warm support to the volunteer movement at a time when it was most needed, and 'Mr. Æsop Smith' was strong on the reform of the divorce laws. Tupper was also an early friend to the colonising of Liberia, and he gave a gold medal for the encouraging of African literature. Both in prose and verse he urged upon his countrymen the duty of national defence, and several of his suggestions were adopted by the authorities. He further displayed considerable ingenuity as an inventor (My Life, p. 217). He was admitted a fellow of the Royal Society on 8 May 1845; and he had the courage to enter a protest against vivisection at one of the society's meetings. He was granted the degree of D.C.L. at Oxford in 1847, and received distinctions from several foreign sovereigns, the Prussian gold medal for science and art being forwarded to him by Bunsen in 1844. In the prince consort's time he was frequently seen at St. James's (in a Queen Anne court suit), thinking it right to make his 'duteous bow, whenever some poetic offering had been received' (ib. p. 222). He was welcomed enthusiastically on his two visits to America in 1851 and 1876. During the zenith of his fame (1850-60) he received many distinguished visitors at his house at Albury, near Guildford, among them Nathaniel Hawthorne, who ill requited his hospitality by some not too agreeable remarks in his 'English Notebooks.' During the next few years he experienced heavy losses owing to the failure of an insurance office, and, though he overcame the impediment in his speech which had been an obstacle in early life, he was unable to recoup his losses by lecturing. He accepted on 26 Dec. 1873 a civil list pension of 120*l.* (COLLINS, Lit. and the Pension List, p. 69; BRITTON, Autobiogr. 1850). In 1883 he was presented with a public testimonial by some of his admirers (Times, 25 and 26 Sept. 1883). In 1886 he published his naïve 'Autobiography' and his 'Jubilate' in honour of Queen Victoria. He died at Albury after a short illness, on 29 Nov. 1889, and was buried in Albury churchyard. By his second cousin Isabelle, daughter of Arthur William Davis (his mother's uncle), whom he married in 1835, he left a large family. One of his daughters, Ellen Isabelle, has published several translations from the Swedish and books for children.

Personally Tupper was a vain, genial, warm-hearted man, a close friend and a good hater of cant, hypocrisy, and all other enemies of his country. He remained the butt of the critics for over half a century without being soured.

Tupper's portrait was frequently engraved. One engraved by J. H. Baker, after Ronchard, was prefixed to many editions of the 'Proverbial Philosophy.' A bust by Behnes was lithographed, and a photograph was prefixed to 'My Life as an Author' in 1880.

Tupper's published works comprised more than thirty-nine volumes. Of his earlier works numerous editions were published in America, where collective editions of his 'Works' appeared at Philadelphia, 1861, and also at New York, Boston, and Hartford. 'Gems from Tupper' and 'Selections' were also published in London, the latter by Moxon in 1866.

[Apart from My Life as an Author (1886), autobiographical material abounds in Tupper's works. See also Foster's Alumni Oxon. 1715-1886; Lincoln's Inn Registers, ii. 146; Burke's Hist. of Guernsey, 1894, ii. 2060; Tupper's Hist. of Guernsey, 1876 passim; Times, 30 Nov. 1889; Athenæum, 1889, ii. 781; Spectator, lxiii. 803; Biograph and Review, vi. 149; Photographic Portraits of Men of Eminence, 1865, vol. iii.; St. James's Gazette, 27 June 1881; Mitford Correspond. ed. L'Estrange, ii. 206; Holmes's Autocrat of the Breakfast Table, 1869, pp. 307, 317, 361; Hamilton's Parodies, vi. 88-91; Allibone's Dict. of English Lit.; Brit. Mus. Cat. Some Letters from Tupper to Philip Bliss, dated 1847, are in Addit. MS. 34676.] T. S.

TURBE, WILLIAM DE (d. 1175), bishop of Norwich. [See WILLIAM.]

TURBERVILLE, DAUBENEY (1612-1696), physician, born at Wayford in Somerset in 1612, was the son of George Turberville of that place. He matriculated from Oriel College, Oxford, on 7 Nov. 1634, graduating B.A. on 15 Oct. 1635 and M.A. on 17 July 1640. On the outbreak of the civil war he took up arms for the king, and assisted in the defence of Exeter in 1645. On its surrender to Fairfax in April 1646 he retired to Wayford, and practised medicine there and at the neighbouring town of Crookhorn. He eventually removed to Salisbury, and at the Restoration on 7 Aug. 1660 took the degree of M.D. at Oxford. He made a speciality of eye diseases and acquired considerable fame. According to Walter Pope [q. v.] he cured Queen Anne, when she was a child, of a dangerous inflammation in her eyes, after the court physicians had failed. He was also consulted for his eyes by Pepys, to whom 'he did discourse learnedly about them' (PEPYS, Diary, 1848, iv. 472, 482, 483). He died at Salisbury on 21 April 1696, and was buried in the cathedral. His wife Anne, whom he married at Wayford about 1646, died without issue on 15 Dec. 1694.

[Pope's Life of Seth Ward, 1697, pp. 98-109; Foster's Alumni Oxon. 1600-1714; Le Neve's Monumenta Anglicana, 1719, v. 175.] E. I. C.

TURBERVILLE or TURBERVILL, EDWARD (1648?-1681), informer, born about 1648, came of an ancient Glamorganshire family, his father being a native of Skerr, Glamorganshire. A Roman catholic and a younger brother (his elder, Anthony, being a monk at Paris), he entered the family of Lady Molyneux, daughter of William Herbert, earl and afterwards first marquis of Powis

[q. v.], and remained in that household until the close of 1675. It was then proposed that he should assume the tonsure, but upon crossing the Channel he took service as a trooper in the French army, receiving his discharge at Aire after six months' service in August 1676. After this he went to Douai to the English College, and then to Paris, where he alleged that he met Lord Stafford and was importuned by him to return to England upon a design of killing Charles II. This improbable story he first told at the bar of the House of Commons on Tuesday, 9 Nov. 1680, when they were hearing any evidence that might be forthcoming against the five popish lords. Bedloe having recently died, anxiety was expressed as to Turberville's safety, and, as a measure of precaution, application was made to the king to grant the witness a general pardon for all treasons, crimes, felonies, and misdemeanours that he might have committed. Nine days later it was noticed with suspicion that the word 'misdemeanour' had been omitted from the pardon, and this oversight was rectified upon a resolution of the house (GRÆR, Debates, 1709, vii. 438, viii. 31). In the meantime 'The Information of Edward Turberville' had been printed in quarto by command of the house (imp. 10 Nov.) In the following month Turberville gave evidence at the trial of Lord Stafford. His evidence was open to very serious objection, for his dates differed materially from those printed in the affidavit. With a view, like Oates, of supplying local colour, he swore that Stafford was suffering from gout at the time of their interviews, whereas it was shown that the earl had never been so afflicted. Above all, though this was not known to the court, when Turberville was converted to protestantism he expressly told Bishop Lloyd [see LORD, WILLIAM, 1627-1717] that, apart from a few vague rumours, he knew nothing whatever of the details of catholic intrigue. He was very poor in 1680, and was stated at Stafford's trial to have recently remarked to a barrister named Yalden that no trade was good but that of a 'discoverer.' Early in 1681, after Stafford's execution, one of Turberville's friends, John Smith, who was also well known as an informer, wrote a vindication of his evidence called 'No Faith or Credit to be given to Papists' (London, 1681, fol.) After the trial of Fitzharris, Turberville read the signs aright, or, as Burnet expressively puts it, he and other witnesses 'came under another management.' On 17 Aug. 1681 he felt constrained to give evidence against Stephen College in opposition to his old ally, Titus

Oates. Oates, whom Turberville now called 'an ill man,' explained the situation by some words that he had heard Turberville let fall to the effect that 'the protestant citizens having deserted him, goddamn him he would not starve.' He was one of the eight witnesses against Shaftesbury at his trial on 24 Nov. 1681. A few days later he fell ill of smallpox, and died on 18 Dec., thus fulfilling Lord Stafford's prediction to Burnet. It has been stated that he died a papist, but this is confuted by the fact that he was ministered to on his deathbed by the rector of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, and future Archbishop Thomas Tenison [q. v.] (see Throckmorton MSS., ap. Hist. MSS. Comm. 10th Rep. App. iv. 174). He made no confession of his perjuries.

[Nicholas's Glamorganshire, 1874, p. 61; Intrigues of the Popish Plot laid open, 1685; Burnet's Own Time, i. 488-509; Echard's History, p. 1012; Howell's State Trials, vols. vii. and viii.; North's Examen, 1740, pt. ii. chap. iv.; Luttrell's Brief Hist. Relation, vol. i.; Hazlitt's Collections and Notes, 1876, p. 420; Irving's Jeffreys, 1898; Ackerman's Secret Horrors Money (Camd. Soc.); Hist. MSS. Comm. 12th Rep. App. vii. 176; Yalden's Narrative of a Gent. of Gray's Inn, 1680; and see arts. COLLEGE, STREPTON, and DUODALE, STREPTON.] T. S.

TURBERVILLE or TURBERVILLE, GEORGE (1540?-1610?), poet, born about 1540, was the second son of Nicholas Turberville of Whitchurch, Dorset, by a daughter of the house of Morgan of Mapperton. To an elder brother, Troilus, who died in 1607, the parsonage of Shapwick in Dorset was let by the commissioners in April 1597, and again in April 1600 (Cul. State Papers, Dom.) He was descended from an ancient Dorset family [see TURBERVILLE, HENRY DE], and James Turberville, [q. v.], bishop of Exeter, was his great-nuncle (see LUTCHINS, Dorset, i. 139).

Born at Whitchurch, says Wood, of a 'right ancient and gentle family,' the poet was admitted scholar of Winchester College in 1554 at the age of fourteen, became perpetual fellow of New College in 1601, left it before he was a graduate the year following, and went to one of the inns of court, where he was much admired for his excellencies in the art of poetry. Afterwards, being esteemed a person fit for business as having a good and ready command of his pen, he was entertained by Thos. Randolph, esq., to be his secretary, when he received commission from Queen Elizabeth to go ambassador to the Emperor of Russia. Thomas Randolph (1528-1590) [q. v.] set out on his special mission to Ivan the Terrible in June 1568, returning in the autumn of the following year; and it was apparently during this interval that Turberville indited from Moscow his first volume, entitled 'Poems describing the Places and Manners of the Country and Peoples of Russia, Anno 1568.' No copy of this work, as cited by Wood, appears to be known, but some of the contents were evidently included among his later verse ('Tragical Tales') under the heading 'The Author being in Moscovia wrytes to certaine his frendes in Englande of the stato of the place, not exactly but all adventures and minding to have describ'd all the Moscovites maners brake off his purpose upon some occasion.' There follow three extremely quaint epistles upon the manners of 'a people passing rude, to vices vilo enclinde,' inscribed respectively to epistles in Annales des voyages, 1589. After his return from Muscovy, says Wood, who remains our sole authority, 'he was esteemed a most accomplished gentleman, and his company was much sought after and desired by all men.'

Turberville had already appeared as an author with 'Epitaphs, Epigrams, Songs, and Sonets, with a Discourse of the Friendly Affections of Tymetes to Pyndara his ladie. Newly corrected with additions,' 1567; imprinted by Henry Denham, b. l. 8vo (Bodleian Library; no earlier edition seems known. The British Museum has only the impression of 1570; it was reprinted by Collier in 1807). The title recalls 'the Songs and Sonnets' of Tottel's miscellany, and the 'Eglogs, Epitaphs, and Sonettes' (1563) of Barnabe Googe, whom Turberville had studied with care. A number of his own epigrams (e.g. 'Stand with thy Snoute,' on p. 83) were appropriated verbatim and without acknowledgment by Timothy Kendall in his 'Flowers of Epigrammes,' 1577. Turberville has epitaphs upon Sir John Tregonwell, Sir John Horsey, and Arthur Broke [q. v.]

Turberville's next venture appears to have been a compilation entitled 'The Booke of Faulconrie, or Hawking. For the onely delight and pleasure of all Nobleman and Gentlemen. Collected out of the best authors, as well Italian as Frenchmen, and some English practices withall concerning Faulconrie, the contents whereof are to be seene in the next page following. Imprinted by Christopher Barker at the signe of the Grashopper in Pauls Churchyard,' 1575, 4to, b. l., with woodcuts; dedicated to the Earl of Warwick. Another edition appeared in 1611, 'newly revised, corrected, and augmented,' with a large cut representing the Earl of Warwick in hawking costume

(the engraving is coloured by hand in the British Museum copy). A versified commendation of hawking and an epilogue are supplied by the author. In the second edition James I is substituted for Elizabeth in the woodcuts. Bound up with both editions generally appears 'The Noble Art of Venerie, or Hunting,' which is also ascribed to Turberville. The 1575 edition of this is dedicated by the publisher to Sir Henry Clinton, and both are prefaced by commendatory verses by Gascoigne and by 'T. M. Q.'

This volume was followed by 'Tragical Tales, translated by Turberville in time of his troubles out of sundry Italians, with the arguments and lenuoye to eche tale. . . Imprinted by Abele Joffe,' 1587, b. l. 8vo, dedicated to 'his loving brother, Nicholas Turberville, Esq.' (Bodleian and University Library, Edinburgh, the latter a copy presented by William Drummond of Hawthornden; fifty copies were reprinted at Edinburgh in 1837 in a handsome quarto). Following the 'Tragical Tales' (all of which, ten in number, are drawn from Boeaccio, with the exception of Nos. 5 and 8 from Bandello, and two of which the origin is uncertain) come a number of 'Epitaphs and Sonets' (cf. COLLIER, Extracts from Stationers' Registers, 1557-1570, p. 203; and art. TRT, CHRISTOPHER). The sonnets, as in the previous volume, are not confined to any one metre or length; the epitaphs commemorate, among others, William Herbert, earl of Pembroke, Henry Sydenham, Gyles Bampfild (probably a relative), and 'Maister [Richard] Edwards, sometime Maister of the Ouldren of the Chappell' [see EDWARDS, RICHARD]. There are several allusions in the body of the work, as well as on the title, to the author's mishaps and troubles of mind, but what these troubles were we are not told. The poet may be the George Turberville who was summoned before the council on 22 June 1587 to answer 'certaine matters objected against him' (Privy Council Reg. xv. 136, cf. xiv. 23).

From the fact that the 1611 edition of the 'Faulconrie' is labelled 'Heretofore published by George Turbervilo, gentleman,' it may be presumed that the original compiler and editor was dead prior to that year.

Turberville has some verses before Sir Godfrey Fenton's 'Tragicall Discourses' (1579) and at the end of Rowlands's 'Pleasant Historie of Lazarillo de Tormes,' 1590. Sir John Harrington has an epitaph in commendation of 'George Turbervill, a learned gentleman,' in his first book of 'Epigrams' (1618), which concludes, 'My pen doth praise thee dead, thine grac'd me living.' Arthur Broke [q.v.] and George Gascoigne were apparrently on intimate terms with Turberville, who was probably the 'G. T.' from whom the manuscript of Gascoigne's 'A Hundreth Sundrie Flowres' was obtained; but there seems no very good ground for identifying the Spencer to whom he wrote a metrical epistle from Moscow with Edmund Spenser, the poet. The attempt which has been made to identify Turberville with 'Harpalus' in Spenser's 'Colin Clouts come Home Again,' is quite inconclusive.

Besides the works already referred to, Turberville executed some reputable translations: 1. 'The Hieroycall Epistles of the Learned Poet, Publius Ovidius Naso, in English verse. With Aulus Sabinus Answeres to certaine of the same,' 1567, London, b. l. 8vo; dedicated to Lord Thomas Howard, viscount Bindon (see COLLIER, Bibl. Cat. ii. 70). A second edition appeared in 1569, a third in 1570, and a fourth in 1600, all in black letter. Six of the epistles are in blank verse. 2. 'The Eglogs of the Poet B. Mantuan Carmelitan, Turned into English Verse and set forth with the argument to every Eglog by George Turberville, Gent. Anno 1567. By Henry Bynneman, at the signe of the Marmayde: dedicated to his uncle "Maister Hugh Bamfild"' (CONSER; the British Museum copy lacks the colophon at the end with Bynneman's device). Another black-letter edition appeared in 1572 (cf. Bibl. Heber. iv. 1486). Another was printed by John Danter in 1594, and again in 1597. These numerous editions point to the high estimation in which 'the Mantuan' was held at the time (cf. Holofernes in Love's Labour's Lost, iv. sc. 3). 3. 'A plaine Path to perfect Vertue: Devised and found out by Mancinus a Latine Poet, and translated into English by G. Turberville Gentleman . . . ' imprinted by Henry Bynneman, 1568; dedicated 'to the right Honorable and hys singular good lady, Lady Anne Countess Warwick.' The British Museum copy bears the book-plate of (Sir) Francis Freeling [q.v.] and the manuscript inscription, dated 5 Sept. 1818, 'I would fain hope that I may consider this as unique.' About 1574, according to the dedication to the 'Faulconrie,' Turberville commenced a translation of the 'haughtie worke of learned Lucan,' but 'occasions' broke his purpose, and, in the bantering words of a rival, 'he was inforced to unyoke his Steeres and to make holy day' (Second Part of Mirrour for Magistrates, 1578).

At the Bodleian Library are two manuscripts (Rawl [Poet.] F 1 and F 4), 'Godfrey of Bulloigne or Hierusalem rescued, written in Italian by Torquato Tasso and translated into English by S<sup>r</sup> G. T.,' and 'A History of the Holy Warr, or a translation of Torquato Tasso, Englished by S<sup>r</sup> G. T.' In the preface to his translation of 1825 Wiffen (under the guidance of Philip Bliss) ascribed these two slightly variant versions to Turberville, and pronounced them to occupy 'a middle station between' the translations of Fairfax and of Richard Carew—no small measure of praise. But Turberville's claim to these versions is more than doubtful, as both style and writing are deemed by experts to be post-Restoration, and there seems good reason for attributing both manuscripts to Sir Gilbert Talbot, who signs a translation of Count Guidubaldo de Bonarelli's pastoral poem, 'Fillis of Sciros' (Rawl. MS. Post. 130), resembling the Tasso poems both in penmanship and in diction (see MADAN, Cat. of Western MSS. in Bodleian, Nos. 14494, 14497, and 14623; note kindly communicated by the Rev. W. D. Macray).

Apart from the commendation of the witty Sir John Harrington already referred to, Turberville received the praise of Puttenham in his 'Art of Poesie,' and of Meres in his 'Palladis Tamia' (1598). Puttenham, however, afterwards speaks of him as a 'bad rhymers,' and it is plain from words let fall by Nashe (in lines prefixed to Greene's 'Menaphon') and by Gabriel Harvey (in 'Pierce's Supererogation' of 1593) that he came to be regarded as the worthy poet of a rude period, but hopelessly superannuated by 1590. Tofte speaks of him very justly in his translation of Varchi's 'Blazon of Jealousie' (1615) as having 'broken the ice for our quaint poets that now write.' He is rather outly dismissed by Park and by Drake as a smatterer in poetry, and a 'translator only of the passion of love.' He himself writes with becoming diffidence of his poetical pretensions in the epilogue to his 'Epitaphs and Sonets,' where he describes himself as paddling along the banks of the stream of Helicon, like a sculler against the tide, for fear of the deep stream and the 'mighty hulkes' that adventured out so far. His fondness for the octave stanza would probably recommend him to the majority of modern readers, and there is something decidedly enlivening (if not seldom crude and incongruous) in the blithe and ballad-like lilt of his verse. He did good service to our literature in familiarising the employment of Italian models, he himself showing a wide knowledge of the literature of the Latin speech, and of the Greek Anthology; and also as a pioneer in the use of blank verse and in the record of impressions of travel.

A far from accurate reprint of Turberville's

'Poems' (i.e. 'Epitaphs, Epigrams, Songs, and Sonets') appeared in Chalmers's 'English Poets' (1810, ii. 575 sq.).

[Wood's Athenæ Oxon. (Bliss), i. 627; Ritson's Bibliotheca Anglo-Poetica; Collier's Bibliogr. Account, 1866, ii. 460; Hunter's Chorus Vatum (Addit. MS. 24488, ff. 9-12); Brydges's Censura Lit. i. 818, iii. 72, and Restituta, iv. 359, Phillips's Theatrum Poetarum, p. 117; Corser's Collectanea Anglo-Poetica, iii. 327, iv. 331, v. 308, Harvey's Works, ed. Grosart, ii. 96; Ames's Typographical Antiquities, ed. Herbert, ii. 945; Brit. Bibliographer (Brydges), 1810, i. 483; Ellis's Specimens, 1811, ii. 180 sq.; Drake's Shakespeare and his Times, i. 456; Dibdin's Library Companion, 1825, p. 695; Warton's English Poetry, iii. 421, iv. 247; Hazlitt's Handbook; Huth Library Catalogue; Bridgewater Cat. p. 262; Watt's Bibliotheca Britannica; Lowndes's Bibliogr. Manual (Bohn); Chalmers's Biographical Dictionary; Turner's Bibliotheca, 1748; Anglia, 1891, Band xiii. 42-71; Gent. Mag. 1818, ii. 45-8.] T. S.

TURBERVILLE, TRUBBEVILLE, or TRUBLEVILLE, HENRY DE (d. 1230), seneschal of Gascony, son of Robert Turberville, was a member of the Dorset family of that name. The family name is very variously spelt in the records. Trubleville corresponds nearly to the modern form of the Norman village Troublerville (Eure), from which it is derived. Between 1204 and 1208 Henry was engaged in litigation with regard to various estates in Melcombe, Dorset (HUTCHINS, Dorset, ii. 425). This suggests that he belonged to the Melcombe branch of the family, which was distinct from the main stock, having its chief seat at Bere, and this is corroborated by the fact that his arms (given in MATT. PARIS, Hist. Major, vi. 477) were not precisely the same as those of the Bere Turbervilles (HUTCHINS, i. 42). In the latter part of John's reign Turbervilles had already gained the reputation of a famous soldier. He adhered to John to the end. In the last year of that king's reign he was employed to pay soldiers at Rochester, and rewarded with forfeited lands, some of which were in Devonshire. He continued to be employed under Henry III. In 1217 he took a prominent share in helping Hubert de Burgh [q. v.] to win his victory over the French fleet commanded by Eustace the Monk in the Straits of Dover (MATT. PARIS, iii. 29). Numerous grants of land in Wiltshire, Suffolk, Lincolnshire, Bedfordshire, and Devon were now made to him.

Before 19 Oct. 1226 Turbervilles was appointed seneschal of Gascony (cf. Foedera, i. 182). He held that office until 1231. The weak rule of the young earl Richard of Cornwall [q. v.] had distracted the country, and Turberville found his task by no means an easy one. His correspondence with Henry III (printed in SHIRLEY, Royal Letters, i. 317-21, 327, 332, 344, and Fœdera, i. 182, 190, 191, 192) shows him contending with want of money, a revolt in Bayonne, a conspiracy in Bordeaux, disputes with the viscount of Béarn, and unsettled relations with the French king. In June 1228 he was the chief negotiator of a truce with France signed at Nogent (ib. i. 192). He importuned the king to relieve him of his governorship; but Henry answered that he must restrain it until the king himself visited Gascony. Despite their disobedience to him at the time, the Gascons afterwards contrasted Turberville's mild rule very favourably with the strong government of Simon de Montfort, describing Turberville as 'custos pius at justus qui nobis pacifice præerat' (MATT. PARIS, v. 295). However, on 1 July 1231 Turberville was superseded, and in 1232 he was again in England (Fœdera, i. 203). In 1233 he distinguished himself in the Welsh war that resulted from the revolt of the Marshals [see MARSHAL, RICHARD, third EARL OF PEMBROKE]. Carmarthen was besieged by Rhys Grug and the Welsh, who had risen in the interests of the Marshals. Turberville took a force of soldiers on shipboard from Bristol and sailed up the Towy to the beleaguered castle and town. The bridge over the river, which was immediately below the castle, was held by the Welsh rebels. Turberville broke the bridge by the impact of his ship and captured its defenders or immured them in the river (Tewkesbury Annals, p. 92; Annales Cambrie, p. 79; Brut y Tywysogion, p. 323, Rolls Ser.).

Turberville was reappointed seneschal of Gascony on 23 May 1234, and was ordered to be at Portsmouth by Ascensiontide to command a force destined to help Peter, count of Brittany (Fœdera, i. 211). He fought vigorously in this cause, but Peter proved faithless, and Henry was soon again in Gascony (ib. i. 214). He was seneschal, with a short break in 1237, until the end of November 1238. After Easter in this latter year he was sent by Henry III at the head of an English force destined to help his brother-in-law, the Emperor Frederick II, against the rebellious Lombards (MATT. PARIS, ii. 485; Flores Historiarum, iii. 227). He was subsequently joined by William, bishop-elect of Valence, Queen Eleanor's uncle, who seems to have assumed the command (MATT. PARIS, iii. 486). They fought for the whole summer against the Lombards, and inflicted great loss upon them. A victory over the citizens of Piacenza on 23 Aug. was their most noteworthy exploit (MOUTON, Chronique Rimée in BOUQUET, xliii. 68). They were recalled before the renewal of Frederick's excommunication. The emperor testified by letter his great obligations to Turberville (MATT. PARIS, iii. 491). Turberville returned to England, and on 12 Nov. 1239 was one of the numerous band of nobles who, headed by Richard of Cornwall, bound themselves by oath to go on crusade. He died, however, on 21 Dec. 1239 (MATT. PARIS, iii. 624).

Turberville is described as 'præclarus miles,' 'vir in re militari peritissimus,' and as 'in expeditionibus expertus et eruditus' (MATT. PARIS, iii. 29, 485, 620). He had a wife named Hawise, who survived him, and had her dower assigned from his Devonshire estates (Calendarium Genealogicum, p. 5). He also left a daughter named Edeline, who married a Saintongeais named Elie de Blénac. Grants of money and kind from the Bordeaux exchequer were bestowed on her after her father's death (BIXON, Rôles Gascons, Nos. 840, 1407). She was apparently illegitimate, for the Melcombe estates of her father went to the Bingham through Lucy, Henry's sister, who married into that family, and must therefore have inherited after her nephew's death (HUTCHINS, Dorset, ii. 426). Moreover, Matthew Paris, in his lamentation over the decay of so many knightly families at this time, expressly mentions the Turbervilles as among the 'shields laid low' (Hist. Major, iv. 492).

[Matthew Paris's Historia Major, Flores Historiarum, Shirley's Royal Letters, Annales Cambrie, Brut y Tywysogion, Annales Mousstici (all in Rolls Series); Rymer's Fœdera, vol. i.; Bémont and Michel's Rôles Gascons, in Documents inédits sur l'Histoire de France; Hutchins's Dorset; Clark's Limbus Patrum Morganæ at Glanmorgan, pp. 448-9.] T. F. T.

TURBERVILLE, HENRY (d. 1678), Roman catholic controversialist, received his education in the English College at Douai, where he was ordained priest. Although he had no academical degrees, and was never employed as a professor in the college, yet his sound judgment and constant application to books rendered him one of the ablest controversialists of his time. Being sent on the English mission, he acted as chaplain to Henry Somerset, first marquis of Worcester [see under SOMERSET, EDWARD, second MAXWELL], during the civil war, and for some time he served Sir George Blount of Sodington in the same capacity. He is also styled archdeacon of Berkshire. 'The clergy,' says

Dodd, 'had a great esteem for him, and consulted him in all matters of moment' (Church Hist. iii. 302). He died in Holborn, London, on 20 Feb. 1677-8 (Palatine Note-book, iii. 104, 175).

His works are: 1. 'An Abridgment of Christian Doctrine, catechistically explained by way of question and answer. By H. T.' [Douai], 1649, 1671, and 1676, 8vo; Baslo, 1680, 12mo; London, 1784 and 1788, 12mo; Belfast, 1821, 12mo; revised by James Doyle, D.D., Dublin, 1827 and 1828, 16mo. 2. 'A Manual of Controversies; clearly demonstrating the truth of Catholic Religion, by texts of Holy Scripture, &c., and fully answering the objections of Protestants and all other Sectaries,' Douai, 1654 and 1671, 8vo; London, 1686, 12mo. This elicited replies from John Tombes, Henry Hammond, and William Thomas, bishop of Worcester.

[Dodd's Cortamon utriusque Ecclesie; Jones's Popery Tracts, p. 486; Tablet, 13 March 1886, p. 419; Bodleian Cat. T. C.]

TURBERVILLE or TURBERVYLE, JAMES (d. 1570?), bishop of Exeter, born at Bere in Dorset, was the son of John Turber-vyle, by his wife Isabella, daughter of John Cheverell. John was the grandson of Sir Robert Turbervyle of Bere and Anderston (d. 6 Aug. 1424). James was educated at Winchester College, and in 1512 was elected fellow of New College, Oxford, whence he graduated B.A. on 17 June 1516 and M.A. on 26 June 1520. He graduated D.D. abroad, but was incorporated on 1 June 1532. From 1521 to 1524 he filled the office of 'tabellio' or registrar to the university. In 1529 he resigned his fellowship, being then promoted to an ecclesiastical benefice, and in 1541 he became rector of Hartfield in Sussex. At an unknown date he was made a prebendary of Winchester, and on 8 Sept. 1555 he was consecrated bishop of Exeter as successor to John Voysey [q. v.] According to a contemporary, John Hooker, alias Vowell [q. v.], his episcopate was disfigured by an execution 'for religion and heresie,' that of Agnes Pirest, burned at Southampton.

In Elizabeth's first parliament he opposed the bill for restoring tithes and first-fruits to the crown, as well as other anti-papal measures. Finally, in 1559, he declined the oath of supremacy, and in consequence was deprived, a fresh congé d'élire being issued on 27 April 1560. On 4 Dec. 1559 he joined the other deprived prelates in a letter of remonstrance, and on 18 June 1560 he was committed for a short time to the Tower (of. Corresp. of Matthew Parker, Parker Soc., 1853, p. 122). He was afterwards placed in the custody of Edmund Grindal [q. v.], bishop of London, and liberated by order of the privy council on 30 Jan. 1564-5 on his finding sureties for his good behaviour (Acts of the Privy Council, ed. Dasent, vii. 190). The rest of his life was passed in retirement, and he died at liberty, it is said, in 1570. Richard Izacke [q. v.] erroneously asserts that he died on 1 Nov. 1559 (Antiquities of the City of Exeter, 1677).

[Vowell's Catalogue of the Bishops of Exeter, 1584; Wood's Athenæ Oxon. ed. Bliss, ii. 795; Strype's Annals of the Reformation, 1824, i. i. 82-87, 93, 129, 208, 214, 217, 220; Strype's Life of Parker, 1821, i. 177, 178, Fuller's Worthies of England, 1662, Dorsetshire, p. 279; Foster's Alumni Oxon. 1600-1714; Transdowns MS. 980, f. 288; Gee's Elizabethan Clergy, 1808.] E. I. O.

TURBINE, RALPH DE (d. 1122), archbishop of Canterbury. [See RALPH D'ESCURNS.]

TURFORD, HUGH (d. 1713), quaker writer, was probably a near relative of Elizabeth Turford, who in 1661 was twice imprisoned for a month or more at Bristol (Basson, Sufferings, i. 51, ii. 638). Turford, who was a schoolmaster, died at Bristol, and was buried there on 5 March 1713. His wife Jane and a son and a daughter predeceased him before 1674.

His 'Grounds of a Holy Life, or the Way by which many who were Heathens came to be renowned Christians and such as are now Sinners may come to be numbered with Saints by Little Preaching' (London, 1702, 8vo), which has become a classic, owing to its appeal to every class of readers, is a broad-minded and entirely unsectarian contention for consistency rather than conformity of practice, urging a return to the primitive virtue of self-denial. It has been translated into French (Nîmes, 1824, 8vo) and into German, many times reprinted, and reached a seventeenth edition in 1802 and a twentieth in 1836. Other editions appeared at Manchester, 1838, 12mo, and 1843; London, 1813, 12mo; and Manchester (27th ed.), 1860, 12mo. Two portions of the book, viz. Paul's speech to the bishop of Orate, and 'A True Touchstone or Trial of Christianity,' were separately issued—the former, Bristol 1746, and Whitby 1788, the latter, Leeds 1785, 1794, and 1799. The whole work was reissued in 1787 as 'The Ancient Christian's Principle, or Rule of Life, revised and brought to Light, with a Description of True Godliness, and the Way by which our Lives may be conformed thereunto.' It was reprinted under this title:

Dublin, 1793; London, 1799; and York, 1812 and 1814. Under this title it was translated into Spanish, 'Principios de los primitivos Cristianos,' London, 1844, 12mo; into Italian 'Massime Fondamentali degli antichi Cristiani,' London, 1840, 12mo; and into Danish, Stavanger, 1855, 12mo.

[Works above mentioned; Smith's Cat. ii. 832, and Suppl. p. 343, Allibone's Dict. of Engl. Lit.; Registers at Devonshire House, Bishops-gate.] C. F. S.

TURGEON, PIERRE FLAVIEN (1787-1867), Roman catholic archbishop of Quebec, was born at Quebec on 12 Nov. 1787, was ordained priest in 1810, was appointed to the chair of theology in the Quebec seminary in 1814, and was made director in 1821. From 1808 he was secretary to Mgr. Plessis, accompanied that prelate to England and Rome in 1819-20, and had much to do in settling the status of the Roman catholic church in Canada and in obtaining recognition for the episcopate. The French ambassador at Rome fruitlessly opposed the issue of a bull (28 Feb. 1834) appointing him bishop of Sidymé in partibus and coadjutor to Mgr. Signay, the then Roman catholic bishop of Quebec 'cum futura successione,' on the ground, it is said, of his pro-English leanings, which had been shown in the war of 1812. They were seen later in the rebellion of 1837 and in his support of the union of 1841. He became administrator in November 1849, and succeeded as archbishop in October 1850, receiving the pallium on 11 June following. He continued to discharge the duties of his office till 1865, when he was stricken with paralysis, and resigned the administration to his coadjutor and successor, Mgr. Baillargeon. He died on 25 Aug. 1867.

Turgeon was the second titular archbishop of Quebec, but was the first to organise the province. Under him met the first (1851) and second (1854) councils of Quebec, both of which were attended by all Roman catholic bishops of British North America. He founded Laval University, the royal charter of which is dated 8 Dec. 1862, and, canonical sanction having in the meantime been obtained, he opened it on 1 Sept. 1854 with a full complement of faculties and a number of affiliated colleges. La Maison du Bon Pasteur was also instituted by him, and he is credited with a principal share in the ecclesiastical ordinances passed by the special council of 1839 as preliminary to the union of 1841: i.e. ordinances (1) recognising the Montreal episcopate, (2) confirming the ecclesiastical title to Montreal Island

Saint Sulpice, and Lake of the Two Mountains, (3) repealing the Mortmain Act (1830) and providing that religious bodies may hold immovable property in the name of trustees as civil corporations.

[L'Abbé Tanguay's Répertoire Général du Clergé Canadien, p. 9; Bibaud's Le Panthéon Canadien, p. 288; Turcotte's Canada sous l'Union, i. 92-6, ii. 148, 278-82; Garneau's Hist. du Can. iii. 226; Lareau's Hist. du Droit Canadien, ii. 443-6, 464-7.] T. B. B.

TURGES or TURGESIUS (d. 845), Danish king of North Ireland. [See THURKILL.]

TURGOT (d. 1115), bishop of St. Andrews, was born in Lincolnshire, and belonged to a Saxon family of good position. The name occurs in Domesday Book among the landowners of that county. After the Norman conquest he was detained as a hostage in the castle of Lincoln, but, having made his escape, he took ship at Grimsby for Norway, where he found favour with the king and became prosperous. Returning home some years afterwards, he was shipwrecked on the English coast and lost all his property. He then resolved to become a monk, and in 1074 Walcher [q.v.], bishop of Durham, placed him under the care of Aldwin, who was then at Jarrow. It is said that, owing to dissension among the monks at Jarrow, Aldwin, taking Turgot and others with him, left for Melrose, where they got into trouble with Malcolm Canmore on the subject of the oath of allegiance. By the advice of Bishop Walcher they returned to Wearmouth, and there Turgot received the monastic habit. In 1083 William of St. Carilef [see CARILEF], bishop of Durham, the successor of Walcher, transferred the monks of Jarrow and Wearmouth to Durham, and made them the chapter of his cathedral. On the death of Aldwin in 1087, Turgot was made prior. He held the post for nearly twenty years, and greatly improved the buildings and privileges of the monastery.

Assuming that he was the author of the beautiful 'Life of St. Margaret, Queen of Scotland' [see MARGARET, SAINT, d. 1093], with which his name is associated, he became at this time, if not before, her confidential friend, spiritual adviser, and occasional confessor. When he took farewell of her about six months before her death, which occurred on 16 Nov. 1093, she committed her children to his care. On 11 Aug. of that year the foundation-stones of the new cathedral of Durham were laid by Bishop William and Turgot, and, according to some accounts, King Malcolm III [q. v.] of Scotland was present and took part in the ceremony. At or about this time Turgot was appointed archdeacon of Durham as well as prior, and was charged to preach throughout the diocese in imitation of St. Outhbert and St. Boisil. In 1104, when the remains of St. Outhbert were transferred to the new cathedral, Turgot assisted, and among the notables present was Alexander, heir to the Scottish throne.

On the death of Edgar on 8 Jan. 1107, Alexander succeeded, and having resolved to appoint a bishop to the see of St. Andrews, which had been vacant since the death of Fothad, the last Celtic bishop, in 1093, with the approbation of clergy and people he made choice of Turgot. This raised the question of the supremacy of the archbishop of York over the Scottish church, which at the council of Windsor held in 1072 had been allowed to belong to the northern metropolitan and his successors. As the archbishop of York was not yet consecrated, Ranulph, bishop of Durham, his suffragan, wrote to Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, for leave to consecrate Turgot with the assistance of two Scottish bishops, or one from Scotland and another from the Norse diocese of Orkney. Anselm refused on the ground that the archbishop of York could not confer jurisdiction which he did not yet possess. The Scottish clergy on their part contended that he had no right to interfere at all. At length it was agreed that Turgot should be consecrated by the archbishop of York, the rights of the several churches being reserved for further consideration, and his consecration took place on 1 Aug. 1109 [see THOMAS, l. 114]. Turgot founded and endowed the parish church of St. Andrews, and dedicated it to the Holy Trinity. In an old manuscript it is stated that in his days 'the whole rights of the Culdees over the whole kingdom of Scotland passed to the bishopric of St. Andrews;' but the change was not effected without much resistance on the part of the Celtic clergy. There were differences also between Turgot and the king. Alexander, like his mother and brothers, wished to assimilate the Scottish church to that of England, but at the same time he upheld its independence, and it is supposed that Turgot favoured submission to the jurisdiction of York. 'Finding that he could not worthily exercise his episcopal office,' he proposed to go to Rome to consult the pope; but his health broke down under the anxieties that preyed upon him, and he obtained leave to revisit his cell at Durham. There, after an illness of several months, during which Thurstan [q. v.], archbishop of York, came to see him, he died on 21 Aug. 1115, and was buried in the chapter-house of Durham Cathedral.

The authorship of the 'Life of St. Margaret' is attributed to him by Fordun and other early writers. The only complete manuscript copy of the life in this country is one of the latter part of the twelfth century in the British Museum, Cottonian, Tiberius D. iii. There is also an abridgment of the beginning of the fourteenth century, Cottonian MS. Tiberius E. i. The author in the dedication describes himself only as 'T. servus sororum S. Cuthberti.' It was written by command of St. Margaret's daughter, Matilda [q. v.], wife of Henry I, and dedicated to her, and during the reign of her brother Edgar, therefore between 1100 and 1106. In 1093 Queen Margaret said to the author, 'You will live after me for a considerable time,' and he refers to his 'grey hairs' when he wrote the 'Life' eight or ten years afterwards. He lived at a distance from the queen, and must have been a very prominent man. The occasional visits of the writer to the Scottish court are not incompatible with Turgot's duties at Durham, where he was prior four years before Margaret's death. The Bollandist version of the 'Life' under 10 June is printed from a foreign manuscript, which gives Theodoricus instead of T., and Papebroch, the editor, attributes it to an unknown monk of Durham of that name. But this seems to have been either another name for Turgot or the error of the transcriber. The 'Life' has been translated into English by Forbes Leith, S.J., (3rd edit. Edinburgh, 1896). Turgot was long erroneously credited with the authorship of Symeon's 'History of the Church of Durham.' Other works have been attributed to him for the existence of which there is not sufficient evidence.

[Fordun; Sym. Dunelm. (Surtees Soc.), 1868; Pinkerton's Scottish Saints; Acta Sanctorum, 10 June; Skene's Hist.; Bellesheim's Hist. of Catholic Church in Scotland; Hailes's Annals; Low's Durham in Diocesan Hist.] G. W. S.

TURLE, HENRY FREDERIC (1835-1883), editor of 'Notes and Queries,' was fourth son of James Turle [q. v.], organist of Westminster Abbey, and was born in York Road, Lambeth, on 28 July 1835. The family went in September 1841 to live in the cloisters of Westminster Abbey, and on 31 March 1845 Henry was admitted as a chorister at Westminster school. Owing to delicate health, he spent from Christmas 1848 to the autumn of 1850 at the school of George Roberts (d. 1860) [q. v.] at Lyme Regis. He was readmitted at Westminster on 3 Oct. 1860.

From 1856 to 1863 Turle was a temporary clerk in that branch of the war office which was stationed at the Tower of London. In 1870 he became assistant to William John Thoms [q. v.], the founder and editor of 'Notes and Queries.' In 1872, when John Doran [q. v.] succeeded Thoms, Turle retained the position of sub-editor, and on Doran's death in 1878 he became editor.

Under Turle's editorship 'Notes and Queries' preserved its reputation for accuracy of knowledge and for varied interest. He was always fond of archæology, and especially of church architecture. With the associations of Westminster Abbey and the school attached to it, he was thoroughly imbued. He was busy at work until his sudden death, from heart disease, on 28 June 1883, in his rooms at Lancaster House, The Savoy, London. He was buried on 3 July in the family grave in Norwood cemetery. He is commemorated in the tablet which was placed to the memory of his parents on the wall of the west cloister of Westminster Abbey.

[Notes and Queries, 7 July 1883, p. 1; Athenæum, 7 July 1883, p. 18; Academy, 7 July 1883, p. 9; Times, 1 July 1883 p. 1, 3 July p. 10; Barker and Stenning's Westminster School Reg. p. 233; information from Mr. J. R. Turle.] W. P. C.

TURLE, JAMES (1802-1882), organist and composer, son of James Turle, an amateur cello-player, was born at Taunton, Somerset, on 5 March 1802. From July 1810 to December 1813 he was a chorister at Wells Cathedral under Dodd Perkins, the organist. At the age of eleven he came to London, and was articled to John Jeremiah Goss, but he was largely self-taught. He had an excellent voice and frequently sang in public. John Goss [q. v.], his master's nephew, was his fellow student, and thus the future organists of St. Paul's Cathedral and Westminster Abbey were pupils together. Turle was organist of Christ Church, Surroy (Blackfriars Road), 1819-1829, and of St. James's, Bermondsey, 1829-31. His connection with Westminster Abbey began in 1817, when he was only fifteen. He was at first pupil of and assistant to G. E. Williams, and subsequently deputy to Thomas Greatorex [q. v.], Williams's successor as organist of the abbey. On the death of Greatorex on 18 July 1831, Turle was appointed organist and master of the choristers, an office which he held for a period of fifty-one years. Turle played at several of the great musical festivals, e.g.

Birmingham and Norwich, under Mendelssohn and Spohr, but all his interests were centred in Westminster Abbey. His playing at the Handel festival in 1834 attracted special attention. At his own request the dean and chapter relieved him of the active duties of his post on 26 Sept. 1875, when his service in D was sung, and Dr. (now Professor Sir John Frederick) Bridge, the present organist, became permanent deputy-organist. Turle continued to hold the titular appointment till his death, which took place at his house in the Cloisters on 28 June 1882. The dean offered a burial-place within the precincts of the abbey, but he was interred by his own express wish beside his wife in Norwood cemetery. A memorial window, in which are portraits of Turle and his wife, was placed in the north aisle of the abbey by one of his sons, and a memorial tablet has been affixed to the wall of the west cloister. Turle married, in 1823, Mary, daughter of Andrew Honey, of the exchequer office. She died in 1869, leaving nine children. Henry Frederic Turle [q. v.] was his fourth son. His younger brother Robert was for many years organist of Armagh Cathedral.

Turle was an able organist of the old school, which treated the organ as essentially a legato instrument. He favoured full 'rolling' chords, which had a remarkable effect on the vast reverberating space of the abbey. He had a large hand, and his 'peculiar grip' of the instrument was a noticeable feature of his playing. His accompaniments were largely traditional of all that was best in his distinguished predecessors, and he greatly excelled in his extemporaneous introductions to the anthems. Like Goss, he possessed great facility in reading from a 'figured bass.' Of the many choristers who passed through his hands, one of the most distinguished is Mr. Edward Lloyd, the eminent tenor singer.

His compositions include services, anthems, chants, and hymn-tunes. Several glee remain in manuscript. In conjunction with Professor Edward Taylor [q. v.] he edited 'The People's Music Book' (1844), and 'Psalms and Hymns' (S. P. C. K. 1862). His hymn-tunes were collected by his daughter, Miss S. A. Turle, and published in one volume (1885). One of these, 'Westminster,' formerly named 'Birmingham,' has become widely known, and is very characteristic of its composer.

[Musical Times, August 1882; Grove's Dict. of Music and Musicians; Bemrose's Choir Chant Book, ed. Stephens; The Earl of Mount-Edgumbe's Musical Reminiscences, 4th ed. 1834; private information.] F. G. E.

TURMEAU, JOHN (1777-1846), miniature-painter, born in 1777, came of a Huguenot family long settled in London. His grandfather, Allan Turmeau, was an artist. His father, John Turmeau, who married Eliza Sandry of Cornwall, was a jeweller in London, but it is probable that he also painted miniatures. The name of John Turmeau figures in the catalogue of the Royal Academy exhibition as early as 1772. 'John Turmeau, jr.,' studied in the school of the academy, and exhibited two miniatures (portraits) at the Royal Academy in 1791, his address being 23 Villiers Street, Strand. In the following year he sent two more miniatures from the same address, and he continued to exhibit occasionally in London till 1836; but long before that date he had removed to Liverpool, and had six portraits in the first exhibition of the Liverpool Academy 1810, of which body he was a member. His address was given as Church Street. In the Liverpool Academy exhibition of 1811 he had two portraits, one of which was of Thomas Stewart Traill [q.v.] In 1827 he was the treasurer of the Liverpool Academy, and he continued to exhibit regularly, residing at Lord Street, and in later years in Castle Street, where he died on 10 Sept. 1846. He was buried in the Edge Hill churchyard. At all these addresses he carried on the trade of a print-seller and dealer in works of art, as well as the profession of portrait-painter.

Most of Turmeau's work was miniature portrait-painting on ivory, which had all the perfection of finish, colour, and good drawing of the best school of that art. He also painted some portraits in oil, one of which, a portrait of himself, is in the possession of his grandchildren in Liverpool, who have also some exceedingly fine specimens of his work on ivory. Probably his best known portrait is that of Egerton Smith, founder of the 'Liverpool Mercury,' which was engraved in 1812 by Wagstaff.

Turmeau married Sarah Wheeler, and had nine children. A son, JOHN CASPAR TURMEAU (1809-1834), after studying under his father, went to Italy with the idea of completing his education as a landscape-painter. Here he spent much time in Rome with John Gibson (1790-1866) [q.v.], to whom John Turmeau had shown much kindness when he was an apprentice in Liverpool. J. C. Turmeau had an architectural sketch in the Liverpool exhibition of 1827, and after his return from Italy practised as an architect in that town, where he died, unmarried, at his father's house in 1834.

[Private information; Lady Eastlake's Life of Gibson, p. 26; Exhibition Catalogues.] A. N.

TURNBULL, GEORGE (1562?-1633), Scots jesuit, was born about 1562 in the diocese of St. Andrews, and admitted to the novitiate in 1591 at the age of twenty-two. For thirty years he was professor at the college of Pont-à-Mousson, and he died at Reims on 11 May 1633. In answer to a work of Robert Baron [q.v.] on the scripture canon, he published at Reims in 1628 'Imaginary Circuli Quadratura Catholica, seu de objecto formali et regula fidei, adversus Robertum Baronem ministrum.' To this Baron replied, whereupon Turnbull published 'In Sacra Scholæ Calumniatorem, et calumniæ duplicatorem, pro Tetragonismo,' Reims, 1632. Turnbull was also author of 'Commentarii in Universonum Theologiam,' which was ready for the press when the author died.

[Gordon's Scots Affairs (Spalding Club); De Bawker's Bibliothèque des Ecrivains de la Compagnie de Jésus, vol. vi.] T. F. H.

TURNBULL, JOHN (fl. 1800-1813), traveller, was a sailor in the merchant service. While second mate of the Barwell in 1799 he visited China, and came to the conclusion that the Americans were carrying on a lucrative trade in north-west Asia. On his return home he induced some enterprising merchants to fit out a vessel to visit those parts. Sailing from Portsmouth in May 1800 in the Margaret, a ship of ten guns, he touched at Madeira and at Cape Colony, which had recently passed into British hands. On 5 Jan. 1801 he arrived at Botany Bay. The north-west speculation turning out a failure, Turnbull resolved to visit the islands of the Pacific, and devoted the next three years to exploring New Zealand, the Society Islands, the Sandwich Islands, and many parts of the South Seas. At Otaheite he encountered the agents of the London Missionary Society, to whose zeal he bore testimony while criticising their methods. After visiting the Friendly Islands he returned home by Cape Horn in the Centina, arriving in England in June 1804. In the following year he published the notes of his travels, under the title 'A Voyage round the World,' London, 8vo. Turnbull's narrative is interesting, his criticisms being often acute and always temperate. He deals with a period when the Australian colonies were in their infancy and the South Seas little known. A second edition of the work appeared in 1813 with considerable additions. The first edition was published in an abbreviated form in 'A Collection of Voyages and Travels,' vol. iii. London, 1800, 4to.

[Turnbull's Voyage round the World; Edinburgh Review, 1806, ix, 332; Gent. Mag. 1813, i, 647.] E. J. C.

TURNBULL, WILLIAM (d. 1454), bishop of Glasgow and founder of Glasgow University, was descended from the Turnbills of Minto, Roxburghshire. After entering holy orders he was for some time an official at the court of Eugenius IV. In 1440 he was made prebend of Balenrick, and in 1445 keeper of the privy seal of Scotland. In 1447 he was promoted to the bishopric of Glasgow, the consecration taking place in 1448. The papal bull authorising the university of Glasgow on the Bologna pattern on 7 Jan. 1450-1, states that it was founded at the instance of James II (who granted a charter 20 April 1453) by the interest and care of William Turnbull, then the bishop of Glasgow. About 1460 the 'pædagogium' was moved from 'the Rottenrow' to the site in the High Street, which the university occupied until 1870. Turnbull died at Rome on 3 Sept. 1454.

[Munimenta Alme Universitatis Glasguensis, 1854; Registrum Episcopatus Glasguensis (Spalding Club); Exchequer Rolls of Scotland, vol. v.; Keith's Scottish Bishops; Glasgow University, Old and New, 1891; Rashdall's Universities of Europe, ii. 304.]

T. F. H.

TURNBULL, WILLIAM (1729?-1796), physician, born at Hawick about 1729, belonged to the family of Turnbull of Bedrule in Roxburghshire. He was educated at the Hawick town school and at the university of Edinburgh, and, afterwards studied at Glasgow. About 1757 he settled at Wooler in Northumberland, and while there was chosen physician of the Barnborough infirmary. By the advice of Sir John Pringle [q.v.] he went to London in 1777, and shortly after was appointed physician to the eastern dispensary. He died in London on 2 May 1796. He was the author of several medical treatises of little importance. A collective edition of his 'Works,' with a memoir by his son, William Turnbull, was published in 1805, 12mo. Turnbull contributed the 'medicinal, chemical, and anatomical' articles to the 'New and Complete Dictionary of Arts and Sciences' (London, 1778, fol.)

[Jeffrey's Hist. of Roxburghshire, 1864, iv. 380; Gent. Mag. 1796, i. 414; Notes and Queries, 2nd ser. v. 276.]

E. I. C.

TURNBULL, WILLIAM BARCLAY DAVID DONALD (1811-1863), archivist and antiquary, born in St. James's Square, Edinburgh, on 6 Feb. 1811, was the only child of Walter Turnbull, sometime of the West Indies, afterwards of Leven Lodge near Edinburgh, and Torry-burn, Fifeshire.

His mother was Robina, daughter of William Barclay, merchant, of Edinburgh. He first studied the law as apprentice to a writer to the signet, and shortly after attaining his majority he was admitted an advocate in 1832. In 1834 he founded a book-printing society which was named the Abbotsford Club in honour of the residence of Sir Walter Scott, and Turnbull continued to act as its secretary until his removal from Edinburgh. His parents were members of the established church of Scotland, but he became an episcopalian, being a very liberal contributor to the erection of the Dean Chapel; and afterwards in 1843 he was received into the Roman catholic church (Browne, Hist. of the Tractarian Movement, 1861, p. 73).

In 1852 he removed to London in order to study for the English bar, to which he was called, as a member of Lincoln's Inn, on 26 Jan. 1856. In 1858 he edited for the Rolls Series 'The Bulk of the Chronicles of Scotland; or a metrical version of the History of Hector Boece; by William Stewart' (3 vols.) In August 1859 Turnbull was engaged as an assistant under the record commission, undertaking the examination of a portion of the foreign series of state papers. He completed two valuable volumes of calendars, which describe the foreign series of state papers for the reign of Edward VI (1860, 4vo) and for that of Mary (1861, 8vo). The fact that he was a Roman catholic, however, aroused the antagonism of the more extreme protestants, and a serious agitation arose against his employment. He was warmly supported by Lord Romilly, the master of the rolls, but, finding his position untenable in the face of constant suspicion and attack, he resigned on 28 Jan. 1861 (Fraser's Magazine, March 1861, p. 386). He subsequently brought an unsuccessful action against the secretary of the Protestant Alliance for libel (July 1861). The Alliance continued the persecution, and its 'Monthly Letter,' dated 10 March 1863, contained a list of documents stated to be missing from the state papers, the insinuation being that they were purloined by Turnbull; but a letter from the master of the rolls to the home secretary, officially published, shows that there was absolutely no foundation for the charge. From the time of Turnbull's resignation ill-health and anxiety broke down a frame that was naturally vigorous, and he died at Barnsbury on 22 April 1863, and was buried in the grounds of the episcopal church at the Dean Bridge, Edinburgh.

He married, 17 Dec. 1838, Grace, second daughter of James Dunsmure of Edinburgh, who survived him. There is a portrait of Turnbull, a folio plate in lithography, drawn by James Archer, and printed by Fr. Schenk at Edinburgh.

He formed a very extensive and valuable collection of books, which was dispersed by auction in a fourteen days' sale in November 1851. Another library, subsequently collected by him, was sold in London by Sotheby & Wilkinson, 27 Nov.—3 Dec. 1863 (Herald and Genealogist, ii. 170).

For the Abbotsford Club he edited: 1. 'Ancient Mysteries,' 1835. 2. 'Compota Domestica Familiarum de Buckingham et Angoulême,' 1836, and emendations to the same volume, 1841. 3. 'Account of the Monastic Treasures in England,' 1836. 4. 'Mind, Will, and Understanding, a Morality,' 1837, being a supplement to the 'Ancient Mysteries.' 5. 'Arthur and Merlin, a metrical romance,' 1838. 6. 'The Romances of Sir Guy of Warwick and Rembrun his son,' 1810. 7. 'The Cartularies of Balmerino and Lindores,' 1841. 8. 'Extracta d' variis (Chronica) Scocie,' 1812. 9. 'A Garden of Gravel and Godlie Flowers: by Alexander Gardyne, 1609; The Theatre of Scottish Kings, by A. G., 1709; and 'Miscellaneous Poems, by J. Landie,' 1815.

Other old authors edited by Turnbull were: 10. 'The Blame of Kirk-Buriall, by William Birnie,' 1836. 11. 'The Anatomie of Abuses, by Philip Stubbes,' 1836. 12. 'The Romance of Bevis of Hampton,' 1837. 13. 'Norm Subseivie: by Joseph Henshaw, D.D., Bishop of Peterborough,' 1839. 14. 'Legenda Catholica, a little booke of sayntlie gestes,' 1840. 15. 'The Visions of Tundale,' 1813. 16. 'Domestic Details of Sir David Home of Crossrig,' 1813. 17. 'Selection of Letters of Mary Queen of Scots, translated from the Collection of Prince Labanoff,' 1845. 18. 'Sir Thomas More's Dialogue of Comfort against Tribulation,' 1847. 19. 'An Account of the Chapter erected by William [Bishop] titular Bishop of Chalcedon; by William Sergeant,' 1853.

For the 'Library of Translations' he translated from the French, 20. 'Audin's 'History of the Life, Writings, and Doctrines of Luther,' 2 vols. London, 1854, 8vo.

For the 'Library of Old Authors' he edited 21. 'The Poetical Works of Richard Crashaw,' 1856. 22. 'The Poetical Works of William Drummond of Hawthornden,' 1856. 23. 'The Poetical Works of Robert Southwell,' 1856.

His genealogical works are: 24. 'The Claim of Molinoux Disney, Esq., to the Barony of Innesay, 1680,' Edinburgh, 1830, 8vo. 25. 'The Stirling Peerage,' 1839. 26. 'Factions of the Earl of Arran touching the Restitution of the Duchy of Chatelherault, 1685,' Edinburgh, 1843, 8vo. 27. 'British American Association and Nova Scotia Baronets,' 1846. 28. 'Memoranda of the State of the Parochial Registers of Scotland,' 1849.

He formed considerable collections for a continuation of William Robertson's 'Proceedings relating to the Peerage of Scotland' (1790), and a folio manuscript volume containing a portion of this continuation was purchased by Mr. Boons at the sale of Turnbull's library in 1863 for 4l. 12s. Another of his projects was a Monasticon for Scotland, for which he obtained a numerous subscription list.

[Gent. Mag. 1863, i. 805; Times, 24 April 1863, p. 12, col. 4; Tablet, April and May 1863, pp. 262, 283, 300, 301; Notes and Queries, 1st ser. viii. 515, 552.] T. C.

TURNER, CHARLES (1774-1857), engraver, son of Charles and Jane Turner of Old Woodstock, Oxfordshire, was born there on 31 Aug. 1774. His father, who was a collector of excise, was ruined by the temporary loss of some valuable documents, and his mother then obtained from the Duchess of Marlborough, in whose service she had lived, a residence at Blenheim with the charge of the china closet. Young Turner came about 1795 to London, where he was employed by Boydell and studied in the schools of the Royal Academy. He worked successfully in stipple and also aquatint, but practised mainly in mezzotint, and became a very distinguished artist in that style. He produced more than six hundred plates, of which about two-thirds are portraits. Of these the most noteworthy are the Marlborough family and a group of the Dilettanti Society, after Reynolds; George IV, Charles X of France, the Marquis Wellesley, and Mrs. Stratton, after Lawrence; Princes Blucher on horseback, after O. Back; Napoleon on board the Bellerophon, after Eastlake; Lord Nelson, after Toppner; Sir Walter Scott and Lord Newton, after Raeburn; Henry Grattan, after Ramsay; and Edmund Kean as Richard III, after John James Hall; also some fine copies of early prints published by Woodburn. His subject-plates comprise 'Surrender of the Children of Tippoo Sultan,' after Stothard; 'Age of Innocence,' after Reynolds; 'Iche,' after H. Villiers; 'The Beggars,' after William Owen; 'Water Mill,' after Callcott; 'A Famous Newfoundland Dog,' after Henry Bernard Chalon; and an admirable rendering of J. M. W. Turner's 'Shipwreck,' now in the National Gallery. Among his aquatint plates are eight views of the field of Waterloo, after George Jones; a view of the interior of Westminster Abbey during the coronation of George IV, after Frederick Nash; and some sporting subjects. Turner was a good original draughtsman, and engraved from his own drawings portraits of J. M. W. Turner, Michael Faraday, William Kitchiner, Joseph Constantine Carpue the surgeon, and John Jackson the pugilist. When J. M. W. Turner projected his 'Liber Studiorum' he entrusted the work to Charles Turner, by whom the first twenty plates were both engraved and published between 1807 and 1809. A difference then arose between them on the financial question, and this led to the employment of other engravers; but later Charles Turner executed three more of the plates, and also several for the 'Rivers of England,' and became a close friend of the great painter, who appointed him one of the trustees under his will. In 1812 Turner was appointed engraver in ordinary to the king, and in 1828 became an associate of the Royal Academy. He exhibited largely at the academy from 1810 to 1857. For about fifty years he resided at 50 Warren Street, Fitzroy Square, where many of his plates were published. There he died on 1 Aug. 1857, and was buried in Highgate cemetery. By his wife, Ann Maria Blake, he had a son, who became a surgeon, and two daughters. The British Museum possesses a complete collection of Turner's works.

[A. Whitman's Charles Turner, 1907; Redgrave's Dict. of Artists; Graves's Dict. of Artists, 1760-1893; Sandby's List of the Royal Academy; Nagler's Kunstler-Lexicon; Rawlinson's Turner's Liber Studiorum; private information.] F.M.O.D.

TURNER, CHARLES TENNYSON (1808-1879), poet, born at Somersby, Lincolnshire, on 4 July 1808, was second son of the Rev. George Clayton Tennyson, rector of Somersby, and elder brother of Alfred Tennyson [q. v.] He was educated at the grammar school of Louth, and afterwards at home under his father's tuition, until he went up to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he matriculated on the same day as his brother Alfred, on 20 Feb. 1828. He there won the 'Bell scholarship' (open to the sons of clergymen) in 1829. He had already given proof of the poetic faculty he shared with so many of his family by joint authorship with his brother Alfred of the 'Poems by Two Brothers,' published by them anonymously in 1827. He graduated B.A. in 1832, and was ordained in 1835 to the curacy of Tealby, Lincolnshire, and after about two years was appointed vicar of Grasby, Lincolnshire. Meantime he had changed his name to 'Turner,' on succeeding to a small property by the death of a great-uncle, Samuel Turner of Caistor. In later life his health compelled the resignation of his living, and he died at Cheltenham on 25 April 1879. In 1836 he married Louisa Sellwood, the youngest sister of the lady who became later the wife of his brother Alfred. His wife survived him less than a month. They had no children.

His nephew Hallam (the second Lord Tennyson), writing of his uncle in the year following his death, tells of the charm of his personality, his fondness for flowers and for dogs and horses, and all living things, and his sweetness and gentleness of character. As early as 1830 he had published a small volume of some fifty sonnets, which attracted the attention of the discerning few, and among them of Samuel Taylor Coleridge, who made some extant notes and criticisms upon them, showing a genuine appreciation. The poet did not again appeal to the public until 1864, when a further collection of nearly a hundred sonnets was published, dedicated to his brother Alfred. Subsequent volumes appeared in 1868 and 1873. In 1880, after his death, the whole of the foregoing were reissued in one volume, with additions, under the title of 'Collected Sonnets, Old and New,' with a brief biographical sketch by his nephew Hallam, a prefatory poem by his brother Alfred, and a critical introduction by James Spedding [q. v.] This volume contains in all nearly 350 sonnets, and half a dozen short lyrics in other forms. Like the only other master of the sonnet with whom he can be compared, Wordsworth, he wrote, or rather printed, too many for his fans. Some are on topics such as the questions at issue between orthodoxy and scepticism, which are wholly unfitted for declamatory treatment in the sonnet form, while others are of inadequate interest or workmanship. But when all deductions are made there remains a considerable body of sonnets of rare distinction for delicate and spiritual beauty, combined with real imagination. Alfred Tennyson reckoned some among the finest in the language, and the judgment of the best critics will coincide.

[Authorities referred to above; Life of Alfred Tennyson, by his son.] A. A.

TURNER, CYRIL (1575?-1626), dramatist. [See TOURNEUR.]

TURNER, DANIEL (1667-1741), physician, born in London in 1667, became a member of the Barber-Surgeons' Company. He practised as a surgeon, and describes consultations with Charles Bernard [q. v.]

(Skin Diseases, pp. 24, 32). In 1695 he published 'Apologia Chyrurgica, a Vindication of the Noble Art of Chyrurgery,' and in 1709 'A Remarkable Case in Surgery.' On 16 Aug. 1711 he was permitted to retire from the Barber-Surgeons' Company on payment of a fine of 50*l*. (YOUNG, Annals, p. 349), and on 22 Dec. 1711 he was admitted a licentiate of the College of Physicians. He published in 1714 'De Morbis Cutaneis, a Tractatus of Diseases incident to the Skin,' a book containing many interesting cases and examples of popular usages, such as the treatment of shingles by the application of blood from the tail of a black cat. The fourth edition appeared in 1731. In 1717 he published 'Syphilis' in two parts, and about 1721 'The Art of Surgery' in two volumes, of which the sixth edition appeared in 1741. He asserted in 1726, in a short treatise, his disbelief in the occurrence of maternal impressions on the unborn child, an opinion which he had already advanced in 'De Morbis Cutaneis;' and he maintained the same view in two pamphlets in 1729 and 1730. His 'Discourse concerning Fevers' appeared in 1727 (3rd edit. 1739), and 'A Discourse on Gleet' in 1729. In 1730 he issued 'De Morbo Gallico,' an edition of the former English translation of Ulrich von Hutten's book, published in 1633 by Thomas Paynell [q. v.]; and in 1730 he brought out his 'Aphrodisiacus,' a summary of the writings of ancient authors on venereal diseases. In 1733 he published an attack on Thomas Dover [q. v.], 'The Ancient Physician's Legacy impartially surveyed,' which contains an account of the illness and death of Barton Booth [q. v.], who had been treated with mercury by Dover, then prescribed for by Sir Hans Sloane [q. v.], and finally examined post mortem by Alexander Small, who found half a pound of mercury in his intestines, a dilated gall-bladder, and several gall-stones, and wrote a description of the case to Turner as an example of the ill effects of Dover's mercurial method. In 1735 Turner published 'The Drop and Pill of Mr. Ward considered' [see WARD, JOSHUA]. A cerate in the 'London Pharmacopoeia' (ed. 1851, p. 57) made of seven and a half ounces each of calamine and wax, added to a pint of olive oil, is said to have been first composed by him, and was long called Turner's cerate. He died on 13 March 1740-1 in Devonshire Square, near Bishopsgate, London, where he had a house for many years, and was buried in the parish church of Watton-at-Stone, Hertfordshire. His portrait was painted by Faber in 1734. His medical attainments were small, and the records of cases are the only parts of his works of any permanent value.

[Works; Munk's Coll. of Phys. ii. 36; Young's Annals of the Barber-Surgeons of London, 1890; Bromley's Cat. of Engraved Portraits, p. 295.] N. M.

TURNER, DANIEL (1710-1798), hymn-writer, was born at Blackwater Farm, near St. Albans, on 1 March 1709-10. He kept a boarding-school at Hemel Hempstead, but at the same time made a reputation as an occasional preacher in baptist chapels. In 1741 he was chosen pastor of the baptist church in Reading. Thence he removed in 1748 to Abingdon, and held the pastorate there until his death on 5 Sept. 1798. He was buried in the baptist cemetery at Abingdon.

Turner received the honorary degree of M.A. from the baptist college, Providence, Rhode Island, U.S.A. He was a friend and correspondent of Robert Robinson [q. v.], John Rippon [q. v.], Dr. Watts, and others. He was twice married: first, to Miss Fanch, by whom he had two sons, who both predeceased him; secondly, to Mrs. Lucas, a widow, of Reading, by whom he had no issue.

Perhaps his best known hymn is 'Jesus, full of all compassion,' which appeared in the Bristol 'Baptist Collection,' 1789. Another, 'Beyond the glittering starry skies,' was published by his brother-in-law, James Fanch, baptist minister of Rumsey, in the 'Gospel Magazine,' June 1776. Turner expanded it by twenty-one stanzas, and included it in his 'Poems,' 1794. Besides many pamphlets and separate sermons, Turner published: 1. 'An Introduction to Psalmody,' 1737. 2. 'An Abstract of English Grammar and Rhetoric,' London, 1739, 8vo. 3. 'Divine Songs, Hymns, and other Poems,' Reading, 1747, 12mo. 4. 'A Compendium of Social Religion,' 1768, 8vo; 2nd edit. Bristol, 1778, 8vo. 5. 'Lectures Religious and Moral,' London, 1766, 8vo; 2nd edit., Henley, 1793, 8vo. 6. 'Short Meditations on Select Portions of Scripture,' Abingdon, 1771, 16mo; 3rd edit. 1803. 7. 'Devotional Poetry vindicated against Dr. Johnson,' Oxford, 1785, 8vo. 8. 'Essays on Important Subjects,' Oxford, 1787, 16mo. 9. 'Poems Devotional and Moral,' privately printed, 1794. 10. 'Common Sense, or the Plain Man's Answer to the Question, Whether Christianity be a Religion worthy of our choice?' 1797.

[Protestant Dissenters' Magazine, xl. 41; In and Songs of the Church, p. 202; Julian's Dict. of Hymnology, pp. 140, 598, 691, 1188; Brydges's Censura Lit. iii. 418; Watt's Bibl. Brit.; Baptist Ann. Reg. 1790-3, p. 127.] C. F. S.

TURNER, DAWSON (1775-1858), botanist and antiquary, born at Great Yarmouth, Norfolk, on 18 Oct. 1775, was the eldest surviving son of James Turner (1743-1794), head of the Yarmouth bank, by his wife Elizabeth, only daughter of John Cotman, mayor of Yarmouth. He was educated partly at North Walsham grammar school, and afterwards privately by Robert Forby [q. v.], rector of Fincham, Norfolk, from whom he may have imbibed his taste for botany. In 1793 he entered Pembroke College, Cambridge, of which his uncle, Joseph Turner (d. 1828), afterwards dean of Norwich, was master. Turner left the university before his father's death in 1794, and in 1798 joined the Yarmouth bank. His first scientific pursuit was botany, especially that of the cryptogamic plants; and the fortune which he inherited on the death of his father enabled him to aid the study of botany and that of antiquities, which he afterwards pursued, by the publication of sumptuous works, and by liberal patronage of the works of others. His earlier independent works were a 'Synopsis of the British Fuci,' with coloured plates (Yarmouth, 1802, in 2 vols. 12mo, and fifty copies on large paper, 8vo); 'Muscologiae Hibernicae Spicilegium,' with sixteen coloured plates (Yarmouth, 1804, 8vo; two hundred and fifty copies privately printed); 'The Botanist's Guide through England and Wales' (London, 1805, 2 vols. 8vo), written in conjunction with Lewis Weston Dillwyn [q. v.], and the magnificent 'Natural History of Fuci,' with 268 figures, which in some copies are coloured, 1808-19, in 4 vols. 4to, and twenty-five large-paper copies in royal folio. Turner also contributed numerous descriptions to 'English Botany' and several articles to the 'Transactions' of the Linnean Society, and formed large collections, chiefly of algae, which are preserved at Kew, having been incorporated in the herbarium of his son-in-law, Sir William Jackson Hooker [q. v.] In 1812 Turner and his wife induced John Sell Cotman [q. v.], the watercolourist, to settle near them. Mrs. Turner and four of her daughters became pupils, and Turner himself not only a patron but a literary fellow-workman. In 1820, in conjunction with Hudson Gurney [q. v.], Turner purchased the Maoro manuscripts, which in 1821 Sir Thomas Saunderson's collection of this he afterwards (in 1853) sold to the British Museum for 1,000*l.* five volumes illustrative of the history of Great Britain, to which he had privately printed a descriptive index (Yarmouth, 1848 and 1851). From 1820 his attention seems to have been mainly directed to the study of antiquities, to which his chief contribution was perhaps his 'Account of a Tour in Normandy, undertaken chiefly for the purpose of investigating the Architectural Antiquities of the Duchy,' with fifty etchings by John Sell Cotman, and the author's wife and daughters (2 vols. 8vo, and also folio on India paper).

Turner died at Old Brompton, London, on 20 June 1858, ten days after his friend, Robert Brown (1773-1858) [q. v.], who had dedicated the genus Dawsonia, among the mosses, to his honour. He was buried in Brompton cemetery, where a monument exists to his memory. Turner was elected a fellow of the Linnean Society in 1797, of the Imperial Academy in 1800, of the Royal Society in 1802, of the Society of Antiquaries in 1803, and subsequently of many other learned societies. He married Mary, second daughter of William Palgrave of Coltishall, Norfolk, by whom he had six surviving children—a son and five daughters. His eldest daughter, Maria, was married in 1815 to Sir William Jackson Hooker [q. v.], and died in 1872; another, Elizabeth, was married in 1823 to Francis Cohen, who had taken by royal license his wife's mother's maiden name of Palgrave [see PALGRAVE, SIR FRANCIS]; and the youngest, Eleanor Jane, was married in 1836 to William Jacobson [q. v.], bishop of Ochester.

Of Turner's library of nearly eight thousand volumes, many were enriched by sketches, engravings inserted, autograph letters, and drawings and etchings by his wife and daughters. In this way he added two thousand drawings to a copy of Blomefield's 'History of Norfolk,' expanding it to seventy volumes, and printing privately (Yarmouth, 1841, 8vo) a catalogue of these illustrations. His own interleaved copy of the 'Muscologiae Spicilegium,' now in the British Museum Library, has carefully coloured sketches of the leaves of all the mosses mentioned, by Sir William Hooker. Most of his library, including the miscellanea and 150 volumes of manuscripts and letters, was sold by auction in 1853; and the remainder, comprising forty thousand letters, besides other manuscripts, was similarly dispersed, after his death, in June 1859, realising more than 6,500*l.* A catalogue of the library, in two volumes, was printed at

Besides those already mentioned, Turner published the following works: 1. 'Remarks upon the Hedwigian System and Monograph of Bartramia,' Yarmouth, 1804, 8vo. 2. 'Catalogue of the Works of Art in the possession of Sir Peter Paul Rubens at his Decease,' 1832? 8vo. 3. 'Specimens of Architectural Remains in various Counties, etched by J. S. Cotman, with Descriptive Notices by Dawson Turner, and Architectural Observations by T. Rickman,' 2 vols. 1838, folio. 4. 'Specimen of a Lichenographia Britannica,' in conjunction with William Borrer, privately printed, 1839, 8vo. 5. 'Outlines in Lithography,' Yarmouth, 1840, folio. 6. 'Catalogue of his Collection of Drawings in S. Woodward's "The Norfolk Topographer's Manual,"' 1842, 8vo. 7. 'Sketch of the History of Caister Castle, near Yarmouth, including Biographical Notices of Sir J. Fastolfe and of the Paston Family,' 1842, 8vo. 8. 'Narrative of the Visit of King Charles II to Norwich in 1671,' Yarmouth, 1840, 8vo. 9. 'List of Norfolk Benefices,' Norwich, 1847, 8vo. 10. 'Guide to the Historian, the Biographer, the Antiquary, &c., towards the Verification of Manuscripts by reference to Engraved Facsimiles,' Yarmouth, privately printed, 1848, 8vo; London, published, 1853, 11. 'Sepulchral Reminiscences of a Market Town, a List of Interments in the Church of St. Nicholas, Great Yarmouth, with an Appendix of Genealogies,' Yarmouth, 1848, 8vo. 12. 'A Collection of Island Hills and Pamphlets relating to Yarmouth,' n.d.

He edited: 1. John Ives's 'Garianonum [i.e. Yarmouth] of the Romans,' 1803, 8vo. 2. 'The Literary Correspondence of J. Pinkerton,' 1830, 8vo. 3. 'H. Gunn's Letters, written during a Four Days' Tour in Holland,' 1834, 8vo. 4. 'Extracts from the Correspondence of Richard Richardson,' Yarmouth, 1835, 8vo. 5. 'Thirteen Letters from Isaac Newton to J. Covel,' 1848, 8vo. He also contributed several papers to the 'Transactions' of the Linnean Society between 1799 and 1804.

In addition to what he published he records (Correspondence of Richard Richardson, preface, p. iii) that he had made preparations for a life of Sir Joseph Banks, and for a new edition of Pulteney's 'Sketches of Botany' continued down to the death of his friend, Sir James Edward Smith [q. v.]

A private lithograph portrait by one of his daughters, after a painting by Davis, dated 1816, is inserted in some of Turner's books.

The only surviving son, DAWSON WILLIAM TURNER (1816-1886), born on 24 Dec. 1816, and educated at Rugby school, matriculated from Exeter College, Oxford, on 7 May 1834. He became a demy of Magdalen College in 1836, graduating thence B.A. in 1838, M.A. in 1840, and D.C.L. in 1862. For some years he filled the office of headmaster of the Royal Institution school, Liverpool. He was known in later life for his extraordinary benevolence. He was accustomed to seek out the destitute and, tempering his charity with friendship, to relieve them without pauperising them. He was also a generous benefactor to the London hospitals (cf. Times, 5 Feb. 1885). Turner died in London on 29 Jan. 1885. On 30 June 1846 he was married to Ophelia Dixon, by whom he had a son and two daughters. Turner was the author of several educational works, including: 1. 'Heads of an Analysis of French and English History,' London, 1845, 16mo; 6th edit. 1865. 2. 'Notes on Herodotus,' Oxford, 1848, 8vo; republished in Bohn's 'Philosophical Library' in 1858. 3. 'Heads of an Analysis of Roman History,' London, 1853, 12mo. 4. 'Heads of an Analysis of the History of Greece,' London, 1853, 12mo; 3rd edit. 1873. 5. 'Analysis of the History of Germany,' London, 1866, 8vo; 3rd edit. 1872. 6. 'Rules of Simple Hygiene,' London, 1869, fol.; 7th edit. 1873. 7. 'Dirt and Drink,' London, 1884, 8vo. He also edited several plays of Aristophanes, and in 1852 translated Pindar's 'Odes' for Bohn's 'Classical Library' (Times, 31 Jan. 1885).

[Proceedings of the Society of Antiquaries for 1858-9; Athenaeum, 1858, ii. 82; H. Turner's Turner Family, 1895; Roget's 'Old Watercolour' Society, 1891, i. 501-4.] G. S. R.

TURNER, SIR EDWARD (1617-1670), judge. [See TURNOR.]

TURNER, EDWARD (1798-1837), chemist, was born in Jamaica in 1798, and was brought at an early age to Edinburgh, where he received his education. After graduating M.D. at Edinburgh in 1819, he studied for two years at Göttingen under Stromeyer, paying chief attention to chemistry and mineralogy. In 1824 he returned to Edinburgh, where he instituted a course of lectures on chemistry; and in 1828, on the opening of University College, London, he was appointed to the new chair of chemistry, which he continued to occupy until his death. He was elected F.R.S. about 1831, and was also F.R.S. Edinburgh.

Turner was the author of a short but clearly expressed 'Introduction to the Study of the Laws of Chemical Combination and the Atomic Theory' (1825), the matter of which was afterwards included in his 'Elements of Chemistry' (1827), a work which ran through eight editions. As an investigator he was very active, and published some forty papers and memoirs, a list of which is given in the Royal Society's 'Catalogue of Scientific Papers.' Most of these deal with the analysis of minerals and salts, and Turner succeeded in throwing much light on the constitution of many of these compounds, especially the ores and oxides of manganese. His most important scientific work, however, was that on the atomic weights of the elements. Stimulated by the hypothesis put forward by William Prout [q. v.], and by the experimental work by which Thomas Thomson (1773-1852) [q. v.] in 1825 sought to confirm it, Turner examined the question for himself. In two papers published in the 'Philosophical Transactions' (1829 p. 291, and 1833 p. 523) he pointed out many sources of error in Thomson's work, and attained results which agreed with those of Berzelius, his conclusion being that 'Dr. Prout's hypothesis, as advocated by Dr. Thomson—that all atomic weights are simple multiples of that of hydrogen—can no longer be maintained.' He died on 13 Feb. 1837 at his residence at Hampstead, and was buried on 18 Feb. at Kensal Green cemetery. A marble bust of him was placed in the library of University College by his pupils.

[Gent. Mag. 1837, i. 434; Engl. Cyclop. Biogr. 1838, vi. 202; Funeral Sermon by the Rev. T. Dale; information from Prof. W. Ramsay.]

A. H.-N.

TURNER, FRANCIS, D.D. (1688?-1700), bishop of Ely, eldest son of Thomas Turner (1591-1672) [q. v.], by Margaret (d. 25 July 1692, aged 84), daughter of Sir Francis Windobank [q. v.], was born about 1688. Thomas Turner (1645-1714) [q. v.] was his younger brother.

From Winchester school, where he was elected scholar in 1661 (Kraus), Francis proceeded to New College, Oxford, where he was admitted probationer fellow, 7 Nov. 1665; graduated B.A. 14 April 1669, M.A. 14 Jan. 1663. Oldmixon ranks him with those who took the 'covenant'; this should be corrected to 'engagement.' His preformants were mainly due to the favour of the Duke of York, to whom he was chaplain. On 30 Dec. 1684 he was instituted to the rectory of Therfield, Hertfordshire, succeeding John Barwick (1612-1664) [q. v.] On 17 Feb. 1684-5 he was incorporated at Cambridge, and on 8 May 1686 he was admitted fellow commoner in St. John's College, Cambridge, to which the patronage of Peter Gunning [q. v.]

attracted him. He compounded B.D. and D.D. at Oxford on 6 July 1669. On 7 Dec. 1689 he was collated to the prebend of Sneating in St. Paul's Cathedral. On 11 April 1670 he succeeded Gunning as master of St. John's, Cambridge; he was vice-chancellor in 1678, and resigned his mastership, 'because of a faction,' at Christmas 1679. In 1688 he became rector of Great Haseley, Oxfordshire, and on 20 July of that year he was installed dean of Windsor. He was consecrated bishop of Rochester, at Lambeth, 11 Nov. 1683, holding his deanery in commendam, with the office of lord almoner. On 16 July 1684 he was translated to Ely (confirmed 23 Aug.) in succession to Gunning, who had made him one of his literary executors. He preached the sermon at James II's coronation (23 April 1685); in the following July he prepared Monmouth for his execution.

Turner's obligations to James did not prevent him from joining in the petitionary protest (18 May 1688) of the seven bishops against the king's declaration for liberty of conscience [see SANROFT, WILLIAM]. He declined the oath of allegiance to William and Mary, and hence incurred suspension on 1 Aug. 1689; his diocese was administered by a commission consisting of Compton, bishop of London, and Lloyd, bishop of St. Asaph; on 1 Feb. 1690 he was deprived. He was in correspondence with James; two unsigned letters to James and his queen, dated 31 Dec. [1690], and seized on the arrest of John Aston [q. v.], are certainly his. He professes to write 'in behalf of my elder brother, and the rest of my nearest relations, as well as for myself' (meaning Sancroft and the other nonjuring bishops). A proclamation for his arrest was issued on 5 Feb. 1691, but he kept out of the way. On 24 Feb. 1693 he joined the nonjuring bishops, Lloyd and White, in consecrating George Hickes [q. v.] and Thomas Wagstaffe [q. v.] as suffragane of Thetford and Ipswich, the object being to continue a succession in the Jacobite interest. Henry Hyde, second earl of Clarendon [q. v.], was present at the ceremony, which took place at White's lodging. In 1694 it was proposed that Turner, who was in easy circumstances, should be invited to St. Germans in attendance on James, a proposal which James approved but did not carry out. In December 1696 Turner was arrested, but discharged (15 Dec.) on condition of leaving the country. On 20 Dec. he was rearrested. No more is heard of him till his death, which occurred in London on 2 Nov. 1700. He was buried on 5 Nov. in the chancel at Therfield; a portrait, painted probably by Mrs. Mary Beale, was transferred from the British Museum to the National Portrait Gallery, London, in 1879. He also figures in the anonymous portrait of the seven bishops in the same gallery. He married (1676) Anna Horton, who died before him. His intestacy gave all his effects to his daughter Margaret (d. 25 Dec. 1724), wife of Richard Goulston of Widdihall, Hertfordshire; thus disappointing the expectation of bequests to St. John's College, of which he had already been a benefactor.

Besides single sermons (1681-5) Turner published: 1. 'Animadversions on a Pamphlet entitled "The Naked Truth,"' 1676, 4to (anon.; against Herbert Croft [q. v.]; answered by Andrew Marvell [q. v.], who called Turner 'Mr. Smirke, or the Divine in Mode,' alluding to his 'starved' demeanour). 2. 'Letters to the Clergy of the Diocese of Ely,' Cambridge, 1686, 4to.

[Wood's Athenæ Oxon. ed. Bliss, iv. 543, 419; Wood's Fasti, cl. Bliss, ii. 218, 262, 267, 281, 292, 309, 310, 387; Foster's Alumni Oxon. 1892, ii. 1519, 1522; Oldmixon's Hist. of England during the House of Stuart, 1730, p. 337; Ralph's Hist. of England, 1746, ii. 255; Macpherson's Original Papers, 1775, i. 491; Bontham's Hist. of the Cathedral Church of Ely, 1812, pp. 204, 262; Cardwell's Documentary Annals, 1839, ii. 316; Lanthbury's Hist. of the Nonjurors, 1845; Baker's Hist. of St. John's College, i. 273, 660, 985 sq.; Notes and Queries, 9th ser. iii. 204.] A. G.

TURNER, GEORGE, M.D. (d. 1610), physician, born either in Derbyshire or in Suffolk, entered St. John's College, Cambridge, as a sizar in November 1569, became a Beresford scholar of that house on 9 Nov. 1570, and graduated B.A. in 1573, and M.A. in 1576. He took the degree of M.D. abroad, and on his return became a candidate at the College of Physicians of London on 4 Sept. 1584, was elected a fellow on 29 Feb. 1588, and was censor in 1591, 1592, 1597, 1606, and 1607. He was a friend of Dr. Simon Forman [q. v.], and seems himself to have dabbled in alchemy (cf. Ashmole MSS. 174 f. 870, 1477 iv. 24, 1491 f. 61 b). He attained considerable practice, and Queen Elizabeth favoured him, so that when his theological opinions were in 1602 urged against his election as an elect in the college, Sir John Stanhope and Robert Cecil wrote a letter saying that his appointment would be pleasing to the queen since there was no objection to him but his 'backwardness in religion, in which he is in no way tainted for malice or practice against the state.' He was chosen an elect the day after this letter, 12 Aug. 1602. He was appointed treasurer in 1609, and died, holding that office, on 1 March 1610.

His wife, Mrs. ANNE TURNER (1576-1615), born on 5 Jan. 1575-6, was described by Lord-chief-justice Coke as 'daughter of the devil Forman'—i.e. the astrologer Simon Forman [q. v.]. The Countess of Essex also styled Forman 'father.' The phrase probably refers only to the professional relations of these ladies with the astrologer, though Mrs. Turner may have been one of his numerous illegitimate children. Both she and her husband were intimate with him, and Mrs. Turner immediately on her husband's death demanded from Forman's widow the return of some pictures, books, and papers belonging to Turner. Mrs. Turner was probably the means of introducing the Countess of Essex to Forman, and both ladies had recourse to the doctor's love-philtres and other devices of magic in order to facilitate their indulgence in illicit amours. Mrs. Turner's object was to secure the affections of Sir Arthur Manwaring, a well-known courtier (cf. Wilson, James I., 1653, p. 57). Turner had left Manwaring 10*l.* by his will, with a hint to marry the widow, who is said to have had three children by Manwaring. In 1613 Mrs. Turner abetted the Countess of Essex in her plot to poison Sir Thomas Overbury [q. v.] when he obstructed her scheme for marrying Robert Carr, viscount Rochester [q. v.]. Richard Weston, the chief of the countess's criminal allies, who was executed as the principal in the crime, had been bailiff to Turner. Mrs. Turner was an accessory before the fact of the murder, which took place on 15 Sept. 1613; she was informed against—nearly two years later—on 10 Sept. 1615, and was examined on 1 Oct. and succeeding days. She denied all knowledge of the crime, and petitioned for her release for the sake of her fatherless children. She was, however, tried for murder at the king's bench before Lord-chief-justice Coke on 7 Nov., and she was condemned to death. On the 10th she confessed her knowledge of the deed, and stated that she concealed for two years the fact of Overbury's death by poison in the hope of shielding the countess, to whom she was devotedly attached. She was hanged at Tyburn on the 14th in starched yellow ruffs, which she is said to have introduced into England. On the scaffold she repeated her confession, professed penitence, and was accordingly allowed burial in St. Martin's churchyard, though without Christian rites (Cal. State Papers, Dom. 1611-18, passim; COBBETT, State Trials, ii. 930 sqq.; AMOS, Great Oyer of Poisoning, pp. 218-24; SPEN-DING, Bacon, xii. 208 seq.; GARDINER, History, vol. ii.)

(Munk's Coll. of Phys. i. 89; Cooper's Athenæ Cantabr. ii. 526-7.] N. M.

TURNER, SIR GEORGE JAMES (1798-1867), lord justice of appeal in chancery, born at Yarmouth on 5 Feb. 1798, came of an old Norfolk family, and was the youngest of eight sons of Richard Turner, for many years incumbent of Great Yarmouth. William Turner (1792-1807) [q. v.] was his elder brother. George was educated at the Charterhouse and afterwards at Pembroke College, Cambridge, of which college his uncle, Joseph Turner, formerly tutor of William Pitt, and afterwards dean of Norwich, was master at the time. He graduated B.A. as ninth wrangler in 1819, was afterwards elected a fellow, and proceeded M.A. in 1822. He was called to the bar by the society of Lincoln's Inn in 1821. In 1822 he edited a volume of chancery reports dealing with cases between 1822 and 1824 in conjunction with James Russell (1790-1861) [q. v.], and, after acquiring an extensive practice as a junior counsel, he was made a queen's counsel in 1840. In 1847 he was elected, in the conservative interest, M.P. for Coventry, and represented that borough until his promotion to the bench in April 1851. Turner was ordinarily content to devote his attention as a legislator to professional subjects. He introduced and carried the useful measure known as 'Turner's Act,' of which the object was to simplify and improve certain parts of the then cumbersome machinery of the court of chancery.

In April 1851 Turner was appointed a vice-chancellor, and received the customary knighthood. In the same year he was sworn a member of the privy council. In 1852 he did valuable work as a reformer of legal procedure in the character of a prominent member of the chancery commission which effected what were then regarded as far-reaching and drastic improvements in the practice of the court of chancery. Although much of the commission's work lies buried under the later reforms that have deprived that court of its independent existence, Turner's efforts served to let the light in upon many dark places, and so prepared the way for their disappearance. In 1853 he became a lord justice of appeal in chancery, and held that position until his death, which took place on 9 July 1867 at 23 Park Crescent, London. He was buried at Kettlehall, near Royston, Hertfordshire. Turner was at the time of his death a bencher of Lincoln's Inn, a governor of the Charterhouse, and a fellow of the Royal Society. On 7 June 1853 he received the honorary degree of D.C.L. from the university of Oxford. He married, in 1823, Louisa, youngest daughter of Edward Jones of Brackley, Northamptonshire, by whom he had six sons and three daughters.

VOL. XIX.

Turner's chief title to remembrance is his work as a judge. For many years the court of appeal in chancery was presided over by Lords-justices Knight Bruce and Turner. The marked contrast in their habits of thought and mode of expression—the vivacity and dry humour of Knight Bruce, and the steadiness and gravity of Turner—blended admirably in result, and their joint judgments have stood the test of time. Turner was on all occasions jealous to repel any attempt to narrow the limits of the jurisdiction of the court, and courageous in expanding its remedial powers to meet modern developments.

[Collections and Notes of the Turner Family of Mulbarton and Great Yarmouth (Harvard Turner); Standard, 11 July 1867; Law Journal, 19 July 1867; Solicitors' Journal, 13 July 1867; Saturday Review, 13 July 1867; Gent. Mag. 1867, ii. 246.] E. F. T.

TURNER, SIR JAMES (1615-1686?), soldier and author, born in 1615, was eldest son of Patrick Turner (1674?-1634), minister successively of Borthwick and Dalkeith, by his wife, Margaret Law. His father, a man of some learning, contributed three Latin poems to 'Hieroglyphica Animalium,' published by Archibald Simeon [q. v.] in 1622-4. The younger son, Archibald Turner (1621?-1681), was minister successively of Borthwick, North Berwick, and the 'old' church, Edinburgh (Hew Scott, Fæsti Eccl. Scot. i. 10, 263, 266, 344, 394, 398). James was educated at Glasgow University, where, much against his will, he graduated M.A. in 1631 (Memoirs, p. 1; Munimenta Univ. Glasguensis, iii. 19). His father wished him to enter the church, but Turner was bent on becoming a soldier, and in 1632 he enlisted in the service of Gustavus Adolphus under Sir James Lumeden [q. v.]. He landed in that year at Rostock, and during the following winter was engaged in establishing Swedish authority in lower Germany. In February 1632-3 he served under the Duke of Brunswick at the siege of Hameln and defeat of the imperialist army sent to relieve it (28 June), and in the following year was present at the siege of Oldendorf and other places. On the news of his father's death in August 1634 he returned to Scotland, but was back at Bremen in the summer of 1635, when he was attached to a mission which the merchants of that town proposed sending to Persia to develop their trade. It came to nothing through the hostility of Russia, and Turner served in 1636 at the siege of Osnaburg, and at that of Fürstenau in 1637. He was promoted successively ensign, lieutenant, and captain. After an abortive visit to Scotland in 1639 in search of employment there, he returned to Germany, and in 1640 proceeded to Stockholm to prosecute before chancellor Oxenstierna a complaint against his superior officer, Burgsdorff.

4 M

From Gothenburg Turner, according to his own account, endeavoured to reach Hull in order to offer his services to Charles I, but, failing in the attempt, he returned to Scotland, and then made his way to the headquarters of the covenanting army at Newcastle. Here, through the influence of the Earl of Rothes, he was appointed major in the Earl of Kirkcudbright's regiment, but never took the covenant. After ten months' service with the Scots army of occupation in England, Turner was appointed major in Lord Sinclair's regiment and sent to Ireland to aid the Ulster Scots against the Irish rebels. He served in the garrison at Newry and in several minor engagements against Owen Roe O'Neill [q. v.], but in 1644 delivered Newry to the English and returned to Scotland, where only the failure of his expedition in April prevented him from joining Montrose [see GRAHAM, JAMES, fifth EARL and first MARQUIS OF MONTROSE]. He reluctantly retained his commission in the covenanting army, and with it invaded England in 1645; it penetrated as far as Hereford, when the battle of Naseby practically ended the war. During Charles I's sojourn with the Scots army in 1646, Turner had interview with him and pressed upon him the necessity of escaping. In 1647 he was made adjutant-general of the Scots army.

In 1648 Turner welcomed the proposal of the Duke of Hamilton and the committee of Scottish estates to send an army into England to rescue the king. He was sent to Glasgow to raise levies and enforce obedience to the decrees of the committee, and while there 'anticipated the methods by which Louis XIV afterwards attempted to convert the Huguenots,' by quartering soldiers on the refractory inhabitants—a method which he found effectual with the most stubborn covenanters (GARDINER, Civil War, iv. 155, 182; TURNER, Memoirs, pp. 53 et seq.) Turner accompanied Hamilton in the invasion of England, and at a council of war held at Hornby on 18 Aug. urged Hamilton to turn aside into Yorkshire and meet the enemy. His advice was rejected, Cromwell routed the Scots at Preston, and Turner capitulated to Lilburne at Uttoxeter on the 25th (Hist. MSS. Comm. 11th Rep. App. pt. vi. p. 129). He was taken to Hull, where he remained a prisoner in the custody of Colonel Robert Overton [q. v.] from September 1648 until November 1649. He was then released by Fairfax on condition of going abroad for twelve months, and retired to Hamburg, whence he made his way to Breda.

Inability to raise money prevented Turner from joining Montrose's ill-fated expedition in January 1650, but he made his way to Scotland in September, landing near Aberdeen on the 2nd, the day before Dunbar. That defeat made the covenanters more tolerant of their episcopalian countrymen, and Turner denounces the hypocrisy which led them to accept as genuine oaths to the covenant which they knew to be counterfeit (GARDINER, Commonwealth and Protectorate, i. 420). Turner was himself 'absolved' after some difficulty, and was appointed colonel and adjutant-general of foot. In this capacity he accompanied Charles II to the battle of Worcester (3 Sept. 1651). He was taken prisoner and sent up to London, but escaped on the way at Oxford. He then walked to London, where he lay hid for a time, and afterwards joined Charles at Paris, where he remained two or three months and learnt the language. For two years he spent most of his time at Amsterdam or Bremen. In June 1654 he landed in Fife on a rash expedition to inquire into the chances of a royalist rising there. His report was unfavourable, but he got away safely and for three years more was engaged in royalist missions on the continent. In 1657 he went with John, first earl of Middleton [q. v.], to Danzig to offer his services to Casimir, king of Poland, against Cromwell's ally, Charles Gustavus of Sweden. Poland was, however, overrun by Swedes, and Turner, after some delay at Danzig, sought employment in Denmark against the Swedes. Peace between the two countries compelled him to return to Breda, where he was in attendance upon Charles II during 1659-60.

At the Restoration Turner was knighted; in an undated petition (Addit. MS. 32117, f. 1) he requested a 'gratuity' for his services, and in August 1662 he was appointed sergeant-major of the king's foot-guards in Scotland. He received a commission as major on 12 Feb. 1663-4, and in July following was employed as one of the visitors of Glasgow University (Munimenta Univ. Glasguensis, ii. 476, 478, 481, 486). On 28 July 1668 he was made lieutenant-colonel; he was in command of the forces in the south-west of Scotland, whose object was to crush the opposition of the covenanters to Charles II's and Archbishop Sharp's attempts to enforce episcopacy on the Scottish church. He resorted to his old method of billeting soldiers on the recalcitrant covenanters, and was very active in extorting fines for non-attendance at public worship. It appears that he did not go beyond his commission, nor as far as he was urged by Sharp, Rothes, and others. His measures, however, provoked the 'Pentland' rising in November 1686. Turner was at Dumfries, where he was surprised by the covenanters on the 15th and taken prisoner. They carried him with them on their march towards Edinburgh, and he was frequently on the point of being put to death; during the engagement on the Pentland Hills (28 Nov.) his guards fled and he recovered his liberty. He was chief witness at the trial of James Wallace (d. 1678).

the leader of the covenanters, on Feb. 1667, but the blame of the insurrection was laid on his rigour, and on 26 Nov. following Charles II ordered the Scottish privy council to inquire into his conduct. On their report in the following February, Turner was deprived of his commissions (10 March 1668). Thenceforth he lived in retirement at Glasgow, or on his property at Craig, Ayrshire, occupied with his 'Memoirs' and other compositions. In October 1688 he was again put in command of some troops in view of renewed disturbances in the south-west of Scotland (Hist. MSS. Comm. 11th Rep. App. pt. vi. p. 167), and on 3 Jan. 1688-4 he was commissioned to try the rebels (Wodrow, 1829, iv. 5). He was granted a pension by James II (Cal. State Papers, 1689-90, p. 383), and probably died soon after 1686. An engraving by R. White was prefixed to 'Pallas Armata,' 1683. A portrait medal is in the National Portrait Gallery, Edinburgh. His wife, Mary White, the granddaughter of a knight, whom he met at Newry in 1643, and married at Hexham on 10 Nov. 1646, survived him, and resided with the family of Lieutenant Richard Turnbull at Lamlash, Arran, dying about 1710.

Turner was a 'soldier to the backbone' (GARDINER); he was 'naturally fierce, but was mad when he was drunk, and that was very often . . . he was a learned man, but had been always in armies, and knew no other rule but to obey orders' (BURNET, Own Time, 1760, i. 296). Wodrow describes him as 'very hookish.'

He published in 1683 'Pallas Armata. Military Essayes of the Ancient Grecian, Roman, and Modern Art of War. Written in 1670 and 1671,' London, fol., dedicated to the Duke of York. He also left a volume of manuscripts (now Brit. Mus. Add. MS. 12087), comprising memoirs, philosophical essays, biographical notices of Mary Stuart, Mary Tudor, Mazarin, Lucrezia Borgia, and others; translations into English verse from Petrarch, Ronsard, and other poets; a criticism of Gauthy's 'Memoirs,' which Turner saw in manuscript; and various letters to him from Burnet, the Dukes of Hamilton, and others. The memoirs, with a few other pieces, were privately printed about 1819; 101 copies were purchased by the Bannatyne Club and issued with its name on the title-page in 1829.

Turner divides with Major-general Robert Monro [q.v.] the honour of being the original of Dugald Dalgetty, whose character is, however, more akin to Turner's than to Monro's (SCOTT, Legend of Montrose, pref.; Notes and Queries, 3rd ser. viii. 144; Blackwood's Mag. October 1898; Literature, 22 Oct. and 5 Nov. 1898). Turner's career may also have suggested some incidents in 'Old Mortality.' The 'Pallas Armata' is there mentioned as the literary pabulum of Major Bellenden, and its author forms the subject of a note (chap. xi. and note).

A contemporary 'Colonel' JAMES TURNER (d. 1664), born at Hadley, near Barnet, the son of a minister there, and said to have been apprenticed to a lace merchant in Cheapside, became a goldsmith and lieutenant-colonel of the city militia during the civil war. Pepys describes him as 'a mad swearing, confident fellow, well known by all, and by me.' His vices and extravagances led him into debt and crime, and he was executed at Lime Street on 21 Jan. 1663-4 for committing a burglary at the house of Francis Tryon, a London merchant. His death was witnessed by Pepys (who paid a shilling and stood 'upon the wheel of a cart, in great pain, above an hour before the execution was done'), and was made the occasion of many catch-penny tracts (see Life and Death of James Turner and other pamphlets in Brit. Mus. Cat.; PEPPYS, Diary, ed. Braybrooke, ii. 270-4; GRANGER, Biogr. Hist. iv. 213).

[Turner's Memoirs; Cal. State Papers, Dom. passim; Add. MSS. 28117 f. 1, 28119 f. 126; Egerton MSS. 2536 f. 341; Burnet's Own Time, ed. 1766, i. 296, 326, 346, and Lives of the Dukes of Hamilton; Hamilton MSS. Ap. Hist. MSS. Comm. 11th Rep. App. pt. vi.; Lauderdale Papers (Camden Soc.), ii. 82, 83; Lamont's Diary (Maitland Club), p. 194; Lauderdale of Fountainhall's Hist. Notices, pp. 383, 391, 426, Bailhe's Journals, iii. 457, Nicoll's

Diary of Transactions, pp. 409, 451 (all these in Bannatyne Club); Guthry's Memoirs, 1748, pp. 272, 275, 277; Wodrow's Hist. of the Sufferings of the Church of Scotland, ed. 1820, passim; Granger's Biogr. Hist. iii. 397; Lingard's Hist. of England, ix. 69; Gardiner's Civil War, iv. 155, 182, Commonwealth, i. 420.] A. F. P.

TURNER, JOSEPH MALLORD (or MALLAD) WILLIAM (1775-1851), landscape-painter, born on 23 April 1775, was the son of William Turner, barber, of 26 Maiden Lane, London, in the parish of St. Paul's, Covent Garden, who married on 29 Aug. 1778 Mary Marshall. He was named after his mother's eldest brother. In the parish register his second christian name is written Mallad. His paternal grandfather and grandmother spent all their days at South Molton, Devonshire. His mother was a woman of ungovernable temper, and became insane towards the end of her days. She had a brother who was a fishmonger at Margate, and another who was a butcher at Brentford, and a sister who married a curate at Islington named Harpur, the grandfather of Henry Harpur, one of Turner's executors. She is said to have been related to the Marshalls of Shelford Manor in the county of Nottingham.

At a very early age Turner sketched a coat-of-arms from a set of castors belonging to one of his father's customers, a Mr. Tomkison, a jeweller in Southampton Street, Covent Garden, the father of a celebrated maker of pianofortes (Notes and Queries, 2nd ser. v. 475), and he made a drawing of Margate church when nine years old, shortly before he went to his first school at Brentford, kept by John White. Here, besides ornamenting walls and copybooks with cocks, hons, &c., he coloured about 140 engravings in Boswell's 'Antiquities of England and Wales' with remarkable cleverness for John Lees, foreman of the distillery at Brentford, for about fourpence a plate, and it is probable that even before this time he made drawings (some, if not all of them, copies of engravings coloured) which were sold at his father's shop for one or more shillings a piece. (One of these, an interior of Westminster Abbey, is in Mr. Crowle's copy of Pennant's 'London' in the British Museum.) His father's shop was frequented by many artists, including Thomas Stothard [q. v.]; and his father, who at first meant him to be a barber, soon determined that he was to be an artist. Though Turner said, 'Dad never praised me for anything but saving a halfpenny,' they were always attached to each other, and his father did his best to enable him to follow his bent. He was sent in 1786 to the Soho Academy, where a Mr. Palice was floral drawing master. About this time he appears to have been for a short while with Humphry Repton [q. v.], the landscape-gardener, at Romford (Notes and Queries, 3rd ser. i. 484). In 1788 he went to a school at Margate, kept by Mr. Coleman. Before 1789 he was placed with Thomas Malton [q. v.] to learn perspective, but proved a dull pupil, though he must have learnt a good deal from Malton, whom he called his real master. He also seems to have learnt much from Dayes (Girtin's master), some of whose etchings of costume he coloured [see Dayes, Edward]. He was also employed in colouring prints for John Raphael Smith [q. v.] and washing in backgrounds for architects, including William Porden [q. v.], who offered to take him as an apprentice without fee. His father, however, preferred to send him to Thomas Hardwick [q. v.], and devoted the whole of a legacy to pay the premium. Hardwick advised Turner to be a landscape-painter, and at his suggestion Turner entered the Academy schools in 1789, where he drew 'The Genius of the Vatican,' &c., and was the companion and confederate in boyish mischief of Robert (afterwards Sir Robert) Ker Porter [q. v.] and Henry Aston Barker [q. v.] He was admitted to the studio of Sir Joshua Reynolds, and copied some of his portraits, including one of Sir Joshua himself.

In 1790 he exhibited his first drawing at the Royal Academy, 'A View of the Archbishop's Palace at Lambeth' (lent by Mrs. Courtauld to the winter exhibition of the Royal Academy in 1887). In 1791 he sent two drawings, 'King John's Palace, Eltham,' and 'Swoakley, near Uxbridge, the seat of the Rev. Mr. Clarke,' and in 1792 'Malmesbury Abbey' and 'The Pantheon this Morning after the Fire,' the first sign of originality in choice of subject. In 1792 he received a commission from John Walker, the engraver [q. v.], to make drawings for the 'Copperplate Magazine,' the first engraving from which, 'Rochester,' appeared in May 1794.

It was probably in 1792 that he made his first sketching tour of any length. He started from the house of his friend Narraway, a fellmonger of Bristol, on a pony lent by that gentleman. The exhibition of 1793 contained two views of Bristol by him, one of which, 'Rising Squalls, Hot Wells,' is said to have been in oil colours (Redgrave, Dict.) The catalogue of this year records that he had set up a studio for himself in Hand Court, Maiden Lane. The drawings for Walker's 'Copperplate Magazine' and Harrison's 'Pocket Magazine' kept him well employed for a few years, during which he travelled over a great part of England and Wales, south of Chester and Lincoln, mostly on foot, walking twenty to twenty-five miles a day with his baggage at the end of a stick. The exhibited drawings of this period (1790-1797) were mostly of cathedrals, abbeys, bridges, and towns, but in 1796 and 1797 he exhibited two scapieces, 'Fishermen at Sea' and 'Fishermen coming ashore at Sunset, previous to a Gale,' and 'Moonlight: a study at Millbank' (said in the catalogue of the National Gallery to have been his first exhibited work in oil colours). At this time he gave lessons in drawing at five shillings, and later at a guinea, a lesson; but he did not care for teaching.

It is probable that during this period Turner was often the companion of Thomas Girtin [q. v.]. As boys they sketched together on the banks of the Thames and elsewhere in London and its neighbourhood. He once told David Roberts, 'Girtin and I have often walked to Bushy and back to make drawings for good Dr. Monro at half a crown apiece and a supper.' They were both of the party of young artists who gathered in the evenings at Dr. Monro's in the Adelphi Terrace [see MONRO, THOMAS, 1759-1833]. The first entry of Turner's name in Dr. Monro's 'Diary' is in 1793 (see ROGER, 'Old Watercolour' Society). There they copied drawings by Paul Sandby [q. v.], Thomas Hearne (1744-1817) [q. v.], John Robert Cozens [q. v.], and other watercolourists, and had the opportunity of studying works by Gainsborough, Morland, Wilson, De Loutherbourg, Salvator Rosa, Rembrandt, Claude, Van de Velde, and others. The drawings made by Turner were generally in neutral tint, and are known as his 'grey' drawings. They are by no means lavish copies, and are exquisite in gradation. Mr. Ruskin says that Dr. Monro was Turner's true master. Another kind patron of both Girtin and Turner was John Henderson, the father of John Henderson (1797-1878) [q. v.]. Down to 1797 Turner's subjects were principally architectural and topographical, though distinguished by their original and delicate treatment of light, especially in interiors like the 'O choir of Salisbury Cathedral' and the 'South Transept, Ely.' But in this year his emulation was excited by the success of Girtin's drawings of York, Jedburgh Abbey, &c., and he started on his first tour in Yorkshire and the north. The result of this tour was an extraordinary development of artistic power and feeling, and in the academy of 1798 he proclaimed distinctly his genius as a painter of poetical landscape by works in oil and watercolours, among which were 'Morning on the Coniston Fells, Cumberland' (now in the National Gallery), 'Dunstanburgh Castle' belonging to the Duke of Westminster, and 'Norham Castle on the Tweed—Summer's Morn,' a drawing to which he attributed his success in life. He repeated the subject several times. With this journey is associated his introduction to Dr. Whitaker [see WHITAKER, THOMAS DUNHAM], for whom he illustrated several local histories. The first of these, 'The Parish of Whalley,' appeared in 1800, and included an engraving of Farnley Hall, the residence of Mr. Fawkes, who was afterwards to be one of his best patrons and most intimate friends. About this time he was employed by Lord Harewood and William Beckford of Fonthill. In 1799 the competition between himself and Girtin was keen at the academy. His subjects were principally Welsh, including Harlech and Dolbadern castles, and the drawing of Warkworth Castle, now at South Kensington. He also exhibited his first picture of a naval engagement, 'The Battle of the Nile,' and was elected an associate of the Royal Academy. He was now only twenty-four years old, and was at the head of his profession. In person he was small, with crooked legs, ruddy complexion, a prominent nose, clear blue eyes, and a somewhat Jewish cast of countenance. Nevertheless he was decidedly good-looking, if we can trust Dance's portrait of him and two pencil portraits in the British Museum said to be by Charles Turner [q. v.], the engraver, all of which belong to this time or a year or two later. He was shy and secretive, allowing no one to see him work, and sharp in all dealings where money was concerned. Before he went to stay with Dr. Whitaker, that gentleman was advised that he was a 'Jew,' and, taking it literally, treated him as an Israelite, to his great annoyance. Ill-educated and unpolished, very proud and very sensitive, conscious at once of his great talents and his social defects, he was always silent and suspicious, and often rough and surly, except with the few who had won his confidence. Among these were the family of William Frederick Wells, the artist, whose daughter, Mrs. Wheeler, who knew him and loved him for sixty years, has recorded that Turner was the most light-hearted and merry of all the light-hearted merry creatures she ever knew. His want of confidence in his fellow-creatures may have been confirmed by a disappointment in love. It is said that he returned from a long tour to find his letters to his betrothed (the sister of a school friend at Margate) had been intercepted, and that she was about to be married to another; but it is impossible to test the truth of this story, to which no date is assigned.

Turner presented 'Dolbadern Castle' to the academy as his diploma work, and removed from Hand Court to 64 Harley Street. Now what Mr. Ruskin calls 'Turner's 'period of development' was over, and with 1800 commenced his 'first style,' in which he 'laboured as a student imitating various old masters.' In 1800 he exhibited 'The Fifth Plague of Egypt,' the first of three scenes of destruction from the Old Testament, the others being 'The Army of the Modes destroyed in the Desert by a Whirlwind—foretold by Jeromiah, xv. 32-3,' exhibited in 1801, and by 'The Tenth Plague of Egypt' in 1802. In 1801, 1802, and 1803 his address in the academy catalogues is 75 Norton Street, Portland Road, but in 1804 it is again 64 Harley Street. He visited Scotland in 1801. In 1802 he was elected a full member of the academy, and for the first time he appears in the catalogue as Joseph Mallord William Turner. He was called William at home, and his name is printed as W. Turner in previous catalogues, except in 1790, when it is J. W. Turnor. In this year (1802) the death of Girtin removed his only serious rival. He is reported to have said, 'Had Tom Girtin lived, I should have starved;' and of one of Girtin's 'yellow' drawings he said that he would have given one of his little fingers to have made such a one. He owed far more to Girtin than Girtin to him, but between them they did more than any others to develop the art of watercolour in England, by raising topography to a fine art and superseding the old tinted monochromes by drawings in colour which merited the name of paintings (see REDGRAVE, Introduction to the Catalogue of Watercolours at South Kensington Museum). There seems to have been some estrangement between them for some years before Girtin's death, but Turner went to Girtin's funeral, and expressed an intention of erecting a stone to his memory. But this was done by others.

The exhibition of 1802 showed that Turner's ambitions went far beyond the poetical topography of Girtin. Besides Girtinesque views of Edinburgh and Scottish scenery, he sent two sea-pieces and also two works of pure imagination, 'The Tenth Plague' and 'Jason.' Turner had beaten 'Louthembourg and every other artist all to nothing' (see Andrew Caldwell's letter to Bishop Percy in NICHOLS'S Illustrations of the Literary History of the Eighteenth Century, viii. 43). In 1802 Turner took his first tour abroad, and in 1803 sent to the academy five pictures or drawings of the Savoy Alps, including the large 'Festival upon the opening of the Vintage of Macon,' belonging to the Earl of Ellesmere. He also sent 'Calais Pier' and a 'Holy Family.' Both of these latter are in the National Gallery, as well as a splendid series of sketches (in very black pencil on tinted paper) of the Alps about Chamonix, Grenoble, and the Grande Chartreuse. From this year to 1812, though he is said to have paid another visit to the continent in 1804, he did not exhibit any foreign subject except the 'Fall of the Rhino at Schaffhausen' (1806). It was a period of great rivalry of many masters, living and dead; of the Dutch sea-painters, especially Van de Velde, in such works as the 'Boats carrying out Anchors, &c.' (1804), 'Spithoad' (1809), the famous 'Shipwreck,' painted for Sir John Fleming Leicester (afterwards the first Lord de Tabley) [q.v.] in 1805, but not exhibited (all these are now in the National Gallery), and the 'Fishing Boats in a Squall,' painted for the Marquis of Stafford, and now in the Ellesmere Gallery; of Claude and Wilson in 'Narcissus and Echo' (1804) and 'Mercury and Herse' (1811) (lately purchased by Sir Samuel Montagu at the Pondor sale for seven thousand guineas), of Poussin in the 'Garden of the Hesperides' (British Institution, 1806), and probably of Titian in 'Venus and Adonis,' though this work was not exhibited till 1849; of Wilkie in 'A Country Blacksmith disputing, &c.' (1807). In 1807 also appeared one of the most celebrated and most individual of his pictures, 'Sun rising through Vapour,' now in the National Gallery—the first decided expression on an important scale of his master-passion in art, the love of light and mystery in combination (see HAMERTON, Life, pp. 99, 100). It was a period also in which he was much employed by noblemen and gentlemen whose patronage had taken the place of the topographical publishers. There were two views of 'Tabley, the seat of Sir J. Leicester, bart.,' in 1809, two of Lowther Castle (Earl of Lonsdale) and one of Petworth (Earl of Egremont) in 1810. It was the period also of the 'Liber Studiorum,' the first number of which was published by the artist himself on 20 Jan. 1807. Turner's 'Liber' was suggested by the 'Liber Veritatis' of Claude, and was partly in rivalry with it, though no fair comparison could be made between the two, as Claude's consisted of slight sketches to identify his pictures by, whereas Turner's was intended to illustrate all classes of landscape composition by very careful engravings in imitation of drawings in complete chiaroscuro. The idea was suggested by W. F. Welle, with its divisions into 'Pastoral,' 'Marine,' 'Historical,' &c. It was published at very irregular intervals from 1807 to 1819. The first plate executed, 'Goats on a Bridge,' was in aquatint; all the rest were a combination of etching and mezzotint. In consequence of a quarrel with Frederick Christian Lewis [q. v.], the engraver, it was not published till the ninth number.

Charles Turner [q. v.] engraved the first twenty published plates (there were five plates in each number) and published numbers 2, 3, and 4. Then Turner quarrelled with him, and published the work himself, employing many of the best mezzotint engravers, with several of whom he had differences. These were W. Say, R. Dunkarton, J. C. Easling, T. Hodgetts, W. Annis, G. Clint, H. Dawe, T. Lupton, and S. W. Reynolds. He supervised the execution of every plate himself with the greatest care, and laid the etched lines of most of them. Some of the plates (about twelve) he engraved entirely himself. Fourteen numbers containing seventy-one plates (including the frontispiece) were published. Twenty remained unpublished. The work has quite recently been completed with admirable skill by Mr. Frank Short. Drawings for most of the plates are in the National Gallery, one is in the British Museum, and a few others are in private hands. The series shows, though not exhaustively, the great range of Turner's power, and wants little to make it a complete epitome of landscape design and effect in black and white. His method of publication was bad, and disfigured by practices the honesty of which it is hard to defend. The original price was 15s. a number for prints and 17. 5s. for proofs, and this was raised in 1810 to one guinea and two guineas respectively. But though he charged a higher price for a proof edition, he issued no number which consisted entirely of proofs. When the plates got worn, as they very soon did (the process of 'steeling' the copper not being then known), he would work upon them, sometimes completely changing the effect, without informing the buyers or altering his price. The best excuse is that sometimes he made a 'new thing' of the plate, and that a few of the later 'states' are considered finer than the first. His whole procedure shows his contempt of the public as 'a pack of geese' (see RAWLINSON, A Description and a Catalogue of Turner's Liber Studiorum; and FRY and ROGER, Notes on Turner's Liber Studiorum).

In 1808 Turner was elected professor of perspective of the Royal Academy. He lectured very badly, but he tried to make up for his deficiencies in utterance by elaborate illustrations. In 1810, besides his exhibited pictures, he painted the 'Wreck of the Minotaur' for Lord Yarborough. In 1811 according to Cyrus Redding, in 1818 or 1814 according to Sir Charles Eastlake, he paid his first and only recorded visit to Devonshire. While with Redding he made many excursions and proved a good companion, and even hospitable, giving a picnic 'in excellent taste.' It was near Plymouth that he found the subject for the famous 'Crossing the Brook,' exhibited in 1815. He also visited relations at Barnstaple and Exeter. During this tour he made many designs for Cooke's 'Southern Coast' [see COOKE, GEORGE, 1781-1834], which was commenced in 1814 and continued to 1826 (forty plates by Turner), when it ceased after a quarrel with Cooke about money, little to the credit of the artist.

Among the most important works of these years not already mentioned were the 'Apollo and Python' (1811) and 'Snow-storm: Hannibal and his Army crossing the Alps' (1812), the effect of which was suggested by a storm at Farnley. The subject was the same as that of a painting by John Robert Cozens, from which Turner said he had learnt more than from any other. It was to the title of this picture in the catalogue he appended the first of many quotations from a supposed manuscript poem of his own called 'Fallacies of Hope.' They are perhaps the best lines he ever wrote:

Craft, treachery, and fraud—Salassian force,
Hung on the fainting rear! Then Plunder seiz'd
The victor and the captive—Saguntum's spoil
Alike became their prey; still the chief advance'd, Look'd on the sun with hope;—low, broad, and wan,

While the fierce archer of the downward year
Stains Italy's blanch'd barrier with storms.
In vain each pass, ensanguin'd deep with dead,
Or rocky fragments, wide destruction roll'd.
Still on Campania's fertile plains—he thought,
But the loud breeze sob'd, 'Capua's joys beware.'

In 1815, besides the 'Crossing the Brook' and several other fine works, he exhibited 'Dido building Carthage, or the Rise of the Carthaginian Empire,' the best of the Carthage series. This picture was a great favourite with Turner, and he once said he would be buried in it. Much of 1816 was spent in the north; he was at Richmond (Yorkshire) in July, probably engaged on those beautiful drawings which he made to illustrate Whitaker's 'History of Richmondshire' (published in 1823). He was at Farnley in September. In 1817 he was at Raby (Earl of Darlington's). In 1818 he visited Scotland to illustrate Scott's 'Provincial Antiquities.' In 1819 he seems to have paid two visits to the continent, one a short one to the Rhine, whence he brought to Farnley a series of fifty-one sketches in transparent and body colour on tinted paper, executed, it is said, in about a fortnight. They were preserved at Farnley till recently, and were exhibited at the winter exhibition of the Royal Academy in 1880. He afterwards, at the suggestion of Sir Thomas Lawrence, went to Italy for the first time.

From this time dated what Mr. Ruskin calls his second style (1820-1835), when he imitated no one, but aimed at beautiful ideal compositions.

The effect of this visit to Italy was seen in the much greater lightness and brilliancy of his colour. He exhibited little for some years, but he executed the lovely drawings for the 'Rivers of England' (published in 1824) and the 'Ports' or 'Harbours of England,' and some illustrations of Byron (published in 1825); and in 1823 appeared the first of those glorious dreams of Italy which are especially associated with his name—the 'Bay of Baie, with Apollo and the Sibyl' (now in the National Gallery).

From 1808 to 1826 he had a country residence, first at West End, Upper Mall, Hammersmith, and from 1814 at Solus, or Sandycombe Lodge, which he built on land purchased in 1807 on the road from Twickenham to Isleworth. Both this house and 47 Queen Anne Street West (now 23 Queen Anne Street), where he removed from Harloy Street in 1812, were built from his own designs. At Hammersmith and Twickenham he indulged in his favourite sport of fishing, and had his own boat and gig. While at Twickenham, if not before, he became intimate with Henry Scott Trimmer, vicar of Heston, who lived about four miles from Sandycombe Lodge. Trimmer was very fond of art, and had some skill in painting. He tried to teach Turner Latin or Greek, or both, but without success. Turner was on intimate terms with the family, very kind to the children, and wished to marry Trimmer's sister, but was too shy to propose. No doubt he loved the Thames, but his country residences had little effect on his art, and the only picture of this time which was suggested by its locality was the 'Richmond Hill' of 1819. He really spent little time at Sandycombe, and it was partly on account of the frequency of his absences that he sold it in 1826. Another reason was that his father was always catching cold from working in the garden. His own health was not good at this time; he was 'as thin as a hurdle.' He spent the winter in Queen Anne Street, but the winter was a severe one, and he wrote to his friend Holworthy, 'Poor Daddy never felt cold so much. I began to think of being truly alone in the world, but I believe the bitterness is past, but has very much shaken, and I am not better for wear.'

For some years after 1825 his exhibited pictures were of little importance. According to Mr. Ruskin they showed a very serious disturbance in temper, but the 'Cologne' of 1826 deserves mention not only for its merit, but because it was the occasion of an act of self-denial on Turner's part. It was hung between two portraits by Sir Thomas Lawrence, which it killed by its brilliant colour. Turner dimmed its glory with a wash of lampblack. 'It will all wash off,' he said, 'and Lawrence was so unhappy.'

In 1827 was published the first part of the largest series of prints after Turner's drawings—the 'England and Wales.' They were engraved by a band of engravers who, with Turner's assistance, brought the art of engraving landscapes in line to a perfection never before attained. Among them were Goodall, Wallis, Willmore, W. Miller, Brandard, Radcliffe, Jeavons, and W. R. Smith. The work consisted of about a hundred plates published between 1827 and 1838. The drawings were unequal in merit, but generally wonderful in colour and atmospheric effect. They were distinctly 'Turners,' poetical compositions of great beauty suggested by the place, and idealising its local characteristics, but paying little regard to literal accuracy. The best of them are greatly prized by collectors, and realise large sums.

In 1828 Turner exhibited his last picture of Carthage, 'Dido directing the Equipment of the Fleet, or the Morning of the Carthaginian Empire,' painted for Mr. Broadhurst, and now in the National Gallery. In the autumn he paid his first visit to the south of France, the heat of which 'almost knocked him up, particularly at Nîmes and Avignon.' He restored himself by bathing at Marseilles, and proceeded along the Riviera to Nice, Genoa, Spesszia, Carrara, and Siena. He was in Rome in October, November, and December, staying at 12 Piazza Mignanelli, whence he sent lively letters to his friends Chantrey and Jones and Sir Thomas Lawrence, whom he thanked for giving his vote to Charles Turner at the academy election. Here he painted several pictures, including one for Lord Egremont, perhaps 'Jessica,' and another 'View of Orvieto' (exhibited in 1830, and now in the National Gallery), 'to stop the gabbling' of those who said he would not show his work. This he exhibited with a piece of rope nailed round the picture instead of a frame. An amusing picture of him at this time is given in a letter from one who met him accidentally in his travels and did not know him. He described Turner as 'a good-tempered, funny little elderly gentleman, continuously sketching at the window, and angry at the conductor for not waiting while he took a sketch of a sunrise at Macerata. "D—the fellow!" he said, "he has no feeling." He speaks only a few words of Italian, about as much of French, which languages he jumbles together most amusingly.' This tour was illustrated in the next academy by 'The Banks of the Loire,' his first picture of the south of France, and 'Messieurs les Voyageurs on their Return from Italy (par la diligence) in a Snowdrift upon Mount Tarra on 22 Jan. 1829.' The same exhibition contained the magnificent 'Ulysses deriding Polyphemus,' sometimes regarded as his masterpiece, and still retaining much of its ancient glory. This and 'The Loretto Necklace' of the same year are in the National Gallery.

He sustained a very deep loss by the death of his father on 29 Sept. 1829 (not 1830, as stated on his gravestone). Turner is said to have never been the same man afterwards. They were greatly attached to each other, and ever since his 'dad' had given up business he had been his son's willing servant, opening his 'gallery' in Queen Anne Street, stretching his canvases, working in his garden, and in all ways doing what he could to save his son's money. Turner must also have felt the death of Sir Thomas Lawrence in the following January. He made a sketch of the funeral from memory, which was exhibited the same year, and is now in the National Gallery. In a characteristic letter to Jones he says, 'Alas! only two short months Sir Thomas followed the coffin of Dawe to the same place. We then were his pall-bearers. Who will do the like for me, or when, God only knows how soon! However, it is something to feel that gifted talent can be acknowledged by the many who yesterday waded up to their knees in snow and muck to see the funeral pomp swelled up by carriages of the great without the persons themselves.'

It was in 1830 that his lovely illustrations to Rogers's 'Italy' were published, and next year Turner made his will, of which Samuel Rogers was one of the executors. After leaving a few small legacies to his next-of-kin (including his illegitimate children by his first housekeeper, who since 1801 had been superseded by her niece, Hannah Danby, who lived with him till his death), he devoted the bulk of his money to found an institution for decayed artists, to be called 'Turner's Gift,' and left two paintings only to the nation, the 'Building of Carthage' and 'the Sun rising through Mist,' and these were so left on condition that they should be hung, as they are to this day, next to the great Bouillon Claudes in the National Gallery. The 'Carthage' he had never sold; the 'Sun rising through Mist' he had bought back at Lord de Tabley's sale in 1827 for 519*l.* 15*s.* This year (1831) he visited Scotland again to illustrate 'Scott's Poems,' and was nearly lost in the Isle of Skye, near Coruisk. At this time he appears to have been cogitating another country residence, for he was building in the neighbourhood of Rickmansworth. In 1831 and 1832 he exhibited two more of his splendid dreams of Italy, 'Caligula's Palace and Bridge' and 'Childe Harold's Pilgrimage,' both in the National Gallery, and, in spite of lamentable decay, still beautiful. It is probable that in these years he paid one or more visits to Holland, and he was certainly greatly interested at this time in both Holland and the sea, for from 1831 to 1833 he exhibited many sea-pieces, several of which were Dutch in subject. To about this time belong his visits to France with Leitch Ritchie, who wrote the letterpress to the 'Rivers of France, or Annual Tour,' the first volume of which was published in 1833. They travelled, however, little together, their tastes being uncongenial. The original studies for the 'Rivers of France' (in body colour, on gray tinted paper) and the drawings made therefrom are among the most characteristic and perfect of his works. Careless, as usual, as to exact topographical accuracy, they express the essential spirit and character of the localities, and the atmospheric effects peculiar to them. Most of them are in the National Gallery. In 1834 a great many other illustrations were published, including the works of Lord Byron, Rogers's poems, Scott's prose and poetical works (for Cadell), and illustrations to Scott for 'Tilt,' besides the second volume of the 'Annual Tour' and two illustrations to the 'Keepsake.' But his work for the book engravers was drawing to its close. In 1835 appeared Macron's edition of Milton, in 1837 Moxon's 'Campbell;' in 1838 the series of 'England and Wales' stopped, and in 1840 appeared an edition of Tom Moore's 'Epicurean,' with four illustrations after Turner. After this the engravings after Turner were chiefly or entirely large single plates, which, despite their elaborate beauty, were unprofitable to the publishers.

Turner's first visit to Venice must have been about 1833, and during 1833-46 the profound impression made upon his mind and art by the 'City of the Sea' was very visible in his contributions to the academy. In every year except 1838 and 1839 he sent one or more Venetian pictures, in which his genius shows itself perhaps with more perfect freedom than in any others of his compositions. From the first they were brilliant in colour and of extreme subtlety in execution—visions of an enchanted city of the imagination; and if, as time went on, they became more and more dreamlike and unsubstantial, they retained to the last a magic and mystery of sunlight and air which no other artist has approached. The Venetian inspiration is but imperfectly represented by oil pictures in the National Gallery; but Mr. Vernon left to it one of Turner's earliest Venetian pictures, 'Bridges of Sighs—Ducal Palace and Custom House—Canal of the Grand Canal' (exhibited 1833), and Turner left it several of his later oil sketches, including 'the Sun of Venice going to Sea' and 'St. Benedetto looking towards Fusina' (both exhibited in 1843). The latter was 'realised' a year later in the 'Approach to Venice,' now belonging to Mrs. Moir, and perhaps the most beautiful of all his Venetian pictures. But the collection of Turner's watercolours in the National Gallery is rich in sketches of Venice. The Venetian inspiration, though paramount during these years, by no means exhausted his energies, which were employed over almost the whole field of his knowledge and experience, and produced some of his most beautiful work of all kinds. From 1833, the year of his first Venetian picture, to 1840, he exhibited the following pictures, all of the highest class; of poetical landscape: 'The Golden Bough' (1834); 'Mercury and Argus' (1836); 'Modern Italy' and 'Ancient Italy' (1838); of scenes on the coast of England: 'Wreckers—Coast of Northumberland' (1831); 'St. Michael's Mount, Cornwall' (1834, Sheepshanks Collection); 'Line Fishing off Hastings' (1835, Sheepshanks Collection); of the Rhine: 'Ehrenbreitstein' (1835); of Switzerland: 'Snowstorm, Avalanche, and Inundation' (Val d'Aoste, Piedmont), 1837. More difficult to class are two or more pictures of the burning of the houses of parliament, exhibited at the Royal Academy and British Institution in 1835 and 1836, and, what is probably the best known and most generally admired of all his works, 'The Fighting Temeraire tugged to her last berth' (exhibited in 1839), the last picture (according to Mr. Ruskin) painted with his entire and perfect power.

Personal records of this time are, as usual, very scanty. In 1833 we find him at the sale of his old patron, Dr. Monro, buying up about ninety of his early drawings at a cost of about 80*l*. In 1834 he met Sir David Brewster at a dinner given at Edinburgh to Lord Grey, and on 16 Oct. of the same year he witnessed the fire at the houses of parliament. In 1836 Turner took a tour in France and Italy with his friend Mr. Munro of Novar. In 1838, on the discontinuance of the 'England and Wales' series, he bought up the whole stock with the copperplates for 3,000*l*., in order to prevent his plates being 'worn to shadows;' and it was in the August of this year that he and Stanfield saw the Temeraire being tugged up the Thames, and Stanfield suggested it to Turner as the subject of a picture. It was during this period that Turner's pictures, on account of their apparently careless handling and extravagant colour, began to excite ridicule. 'Blackwood,' which only a few years before had called him the greatest landscape artist since Claude, abused his Venetian pictures in 1835, stigmatised the 'Grand Canal' in 1837 as a bold attempt to insult the public taste, and in 1839 excepted the 'Temeraire' alone from a general condemnation. Nevertheless we have it on the authority of John Pys (1782-1874) [q. v.] that from 1840 to 1861 Turner's reputation and in proportion the price of the 'Liber Studiorum' rose. Possibly the fame of the 'Temeraire' may have done something towards this, but there can be no doubt that the enormous increase in Turner's reputation during the last years of his life was greatly due to Mr. Ruskin and 'Modern Painters,' the first volume of which appeared in 1843. In 1840 Mr. Ruskin, then just twenty-one, but already for several years an enthusiastic admirer of the artist, was introduced to Turner by Mr. Griffith. Having done with print-sellers who used to purchase all his drawings, Turner now employed Mr. Griffith as his agent for the sale of his works. The famous picture of 'The Slave Ship,' so eloquently described in 'Modern Painters' (vol. i.), and long in the possession of Mr. Ruskin, was exhibited in 1840.

Although from this time may be noted some failure of Turner in both health and power, he was during the next five years to produce some of the most characteristic and imitable of his works. Among those most remarkable for their simplicity, their grandeur and splendour of colour, are the drawings executed in 1842—three from sketches made by him in Switzerland in 1840, 1841, and perhaps 1843 (see notes by Mr. Ruskin on his drawings by Turner, exhibited at the Fine Arts Society in 1879). Of one of the drawings, 'The Splügen,' Mr. Ruskin says that it is 'the best Swiss landscape yet painted by man.' Another ('Lucerne') Mr. Ruskin sold for 1,000*l.*, and probably it would fetch a great deal more now.

To these five years belong such exquisite Venetian visions as the 'Giudecca, &c.' (1841), and 'Depositing of John Bellini's three Pictures in La Chiesa Redentore' (1841), 'The Campo Santo' (1842) (now belonging to Mr. Keiller), and 'The Approach to Venice' (1843), besides a few works of singular interest and power, like 'Peace—Burial at Sea' (1842), 'The Snow-storm' of the same year, and 'Rain, Steam, and Speed' (1844), all in the National Gallery. 'Peace—Burial at Sea,' is an imaginative sketch of Wilkie's funeral by night off Gibraltar, with rockets in the distance, a glare of light on the eponson, and sails hanging black against the cold sky. When Stanfield complained of the blackness of the sails, Turner answered, 'If I could find anything blacker than black, I'd use it.' The 'Snowstorm' is an impression of a storm while he was on board the Ariel, a Margate steamer, when he had himself lashed to the mast to observe it, remaining so for four hours. 'I did not expect to escape,' he said to Charles Kingsley, 'but I felt bound to record it if I did.' It was described as 'soapsuds and whitewash,' to the artist's great annoyance. 'Soapsuds and whitewash,' he said to Mr. Ruskin. 'What would they have? I wonder what they think the sea's like. I wish they had been in it.' 'Rain, Steam, and Speed' represents an extensive landscape seen through a mist of rain. A thousand veiled objects gradually reveal themselves as you look at it. It well realises his saying that 'indistinctness was his forte.' Some others of his later works were more open to ridicule—vain endeavours to represent vague thoughts in colour language, such as 'War—the Exile [Napoleon at St. Helena] and the Rock Limpet,' 'Shade and Darkness—the Evening of the Deluge,' and 'Light and Colour (Goethe's Theory)—The Morning after the Deluge—Moses writing the Book of Genesis.' These pictures and the quotations from that melancholy manuscript, 'The Fallacies of Hope,' with which their titles were accompanied in the catalogues, afforded easy sport to the young wits of 'Punch' and other periodicals (a collection of some of the cleverest of their jeux d'esprit will be found in THORNBURY's Life, chap. xxxvi). Turner was very sensitive to such attacks. They were to him, says Mr. Ruskin, 'not merely contemptible in their ignorance, but amazing in their ingratitude. "A man may be weak in his age," he said to me once at the time when he felt he was dying, "but you should not tell him so."'

In addition to his Venetian pictures of 1841, he exhibited 'Rosenau, the seat of H.R.H. Prince Albert of Coburg,' intended perhaps as a compliment to the queen, and in 1843 a picture painted in honour of the king of Bavaria, called 'The Opening of the Walhalla, 1842.' He sent this picture, which was very inaccurate and probably painted from an engraving, as a present to the king, who returned it to the artist, thus affording another instance of 'the fallacies of hope.' It is now in the National Gallery. In 1841 (the year when both Wilkie and his old friend Chantrey died) he complained that his health was 'on the wain.' His sight was now beginning to fail, and in 1842 he was very ill and living by rule. In 1843 he paid his last recorded visits to the continent and to Margate. The year 1845 is assigned by Mr. Ruskin as the end of his third period, when mind and sight began to fail; but the pictures of the few remaining years of his life, if incoherent, were often of great beauty in colour, and his mind was still active. He began a new class of subjects, 'Whalers,' of which he sent several pictures to the academy, and he took great interest in the new art of photography, then in the daguerreotype stage. He paid Mayall a visit in 1847, and was photographed several times; but he concealed his identity, calling himself a master of chancery, and the plates were not preserved.

For some time before his death his frequent absence from Queen Anne Street led his friends to suspect that he had another home. He had taken a house at Chelsea by the side of the river near Cramorne Gardens, where he lived with Sophia Caroline Booth, his 'good old Margate landlady' Mr. Ruskin calls her. He adopted her name, and both at Chelsea and at Margate he was known as Mr. Booth, Admiral Booth, or 'Puggy' Booth. Many of his friends tried in vain to discover his retreat, but were always foiled with great ingenuity by Turner. He had no picture at the academy in 1851, but he came to the private view, and went to see his old friend David Roberts. After this he disappeared again. At length Hannah Danby, his old housekeeper in Queen Anne Street, obtained a clue to his whereabouts by a letter left in an old coat, and he was found the day before his death, which took place at Chelsea on 19 Dec. 1851. In accordance with his own request he was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral, and his funeral was largely attended by his fellow artists and others.

Turner's will (with four codicils) was proved on 6 Sept. 1852, and the property was sworn under 140,000*l*. The testamentary papers were so confused that litigation lasted for four years, and resulted in a compromise to the following effect: (1) the real estate to go to the heir-at-law; (2) the pictures, &c., to go to the National Gallery; (3) 1,000*l*. for the erection of a monument in St. Paul's Cathedral; (4) 20,000*l*. to the Royal Academy, free of legacy duty; (5) remainder to be divided among next-of-kin. By this decision one of the main objects of the will, the foundation of a charity, to be called 'Turner's Gift,' for 'male decayed artists living in England, and of English parents only and lawful issue,' was entirely frustrated, but the nation became possessor of 362 pictures, 135 finished watercolour drawings, 1,757 studies in colour, and sketches innumerable. Over nineteen thousand pieces of paper, more or less drawn upon, and in every state of neglect and decay, were taken from his dirty and dilapidated house in Queen Anne Street to the National Gallery, where they were put in order and protected from further damage by Mr. Ruskin. The National Gallery also possesses portfolios and other memorials of the great painter, besides a portrait of him painted by himself in 1802, when he was twenty-seven. A beautiful engraving of this painting forms the frontispiece to Wornum's 'Turner Gallery.' Mr. Ruskin possesses another portrait. A third was painted by Lincolnton from memoranda taken by stealth, and there is also a full-length outline sketch, in which Turner is stirring a cup of coffee, by Count d'Orsay. Thornbury's 'Life' contains sketches after the portrait by Dance, and from the statue by MacDowell in St. Paul's.

Turner lived a life of continued prosperity and almost continued fame from his boyhood to his death. In later life he had to endure some ridicule, and his works were not (and he felt that they were not) fully understood or prized for the most transcendent of their qualities, but he lived to see the publication of the first two volumes of 'Modern Painters,' in which he was praised as no other artist was ever praised before. Not only in 'Modern Painters,' but in many other books, Mr. Ruskin has described and analysed the great painter's powers, both mental and artistic, with a sympathy, an enthusiasm, and a power of language which have made their names inseparable. Among Turner's strongest passions were his love of fame and his love of money, but the strongest of all was his love of nature. He studied her every day, early and late, throughout his life. On his tours, on foot, on sea, or in the coach, in England, Scotland, Switzerland, France, Germany, Holland, and Italy, he was constantly at work, noting as he went, in swift pencil outline, all he thought worthy of memory; and his memory was equal to his industry. No mind was ever so stored with impressions of nature or was so able to weave them at will into visions of beauty.

A life so absorbed had little to spare for the ordinary claims of society, and he was by nature and bringing up shy and suspicious, but nothing conduced more to his mental and moral solitude than his incapacity to express himself in words. He had a mind of unusual range and feelings of unusual depth, but he could scarcely write a sentence of plain English.

Other artists, like Claude, Cuyp, Crome, and Constable, have painted certain familiar aspects of nature with more fidelity and completeness, but no landscape-painter has equalled Turner in range, in imagination, or in blimzy. His technique in oils was unsound, but in watercolours it was supreme; and in oils his dexterity was such that he obtained unrivalled effects in that medium. It is impossible to estimate his power without study of his watercolour drawings, especially as so many of his finest works in oil are mere wrecks of what they were. Far from decreasing since his death, his fame is still extending in England and abroad, and the prices given for his works increase every year. At the sale of Mr. Elhanan Bicknell's collection in 1863, ten pictures, for which he had paid 3,750*l*. 1*l*. 9*d*., realised 17,261*l*. 10*s*.; but since then four only of these very pictures — 'Heloetalsluyt' (1832), 'Antwerp' (1833), 'Wreckers' (1834), and 'Yonics, the Giudicca,' &c. (1841) — have sold at Christie's for 28,665*l*. The following are the 'top' prices fetched by Turner's oil pictures: 'Grand Canal,' Mendel sale, 7,000 guineas, 1875; 'Antwerp,' Graham sale, 6,500 guineas, 1889; 'Sheerness,' Wells sale, 7,100 guineas, 1890; 'Walton Bridges,'

Essex sale, 7,100 guineas, 1891; 'Heloat-slays,' Price sale, 6,400 guineas, 1895; and at the Pander sale in 1897, 'Venice, the Giudecca,' &c. (1841), 6,800 guineas; 'Depositing John Bellini's three Pictures in La Chiesa Redantore, Venice' (1841), 7,000 guineas; 'Mercury and Herse' (1811), 7,500 guineas, and 'Wreckers' (1834), 7,000 guineas.

Turner's private life was sordid and sensual, but he was a good son, a staunch friend, and grateful to those who had been kind to him. He was miserly by habit, but he could be generous at times. His heart was very tender; he never spoke ill of any one; he was kind to children, and would not distress on his tenants. Though rough in manners to the outside world, he was genial and convivial with his brother artists, and full of a shrewd and merry humour. He intended to devote the whole of his fortune for the benefit of artists and art, and he conferred an incalculable benefit on the nation by the bequest of his pictures and drawings. Though in his later years he was offered a large sum for pictures, in order that they might be preserved to the nation, he refused to take the money because he had 'willed' them to the nation himself. He was for some time greatly interested in the Artists' Benevolent Fund, and the students of the Royal Academy owe him a debt of gratitude for the institution of the 'Turner' medal for landscape.

Besides the works by Turner at the National Gallery, the South Kensington Museum, and the British Museum, others are to be found in all the principal art galleries and museums throughout the country. Fine collections of Turner drawings have been given by Mr. Ruskin to the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and the Whitworth Institute at Manchester contains another collection (principally consisting of his earlier works), presented by Mr J. E. Taylor and others.

[Thornbury's Life (founded on letters and papers), London, 2 vols. 1862; Hammerton's Life, with nine illustrations, 1879; Monkhouse's Turner in Great Artists Series, 1882; Alaric Watts's Memoir in Liber Studiorum, 1853; Peter Cunningham's Memoir in John Burnet's Turner and his Works, 1862-3; Worsum's Turner Gallery, 1850; Thomas Miller's Turner and Girtin's Picturesque Views, 1862; Art Journal, January 1862, January 1867; Athenaeum, December 1851, January 1852; Ruskin's Modern Painters, Preterita, &c.; Drye's Professional Sketches of Modern Artists; Redgrave's Century; Redgrave's Dict.; Rawlinson's Liber Studiorum; Leslie's Life of Constable; Leslie's Autobiography; Leslie's Handbook for Young Painters; Encyclopædia Britannica; Pye and Rogot's Notes on

Turner's Liber Studiorum; Rogot's 'Old Water-colour' Society; Pye's Patronage of British Art; Cat. of Burlington Fine Art Soc.—Water-colours 1871, Liber Studiorum 1872, Architectural Subjects 1884; Cyrus Redding's Autobiography; Cat. of Manchester Whitworth Institute; Monkhouse's Early English Painters in Watercolour; unpublished correspondence.]

C. M.

TURNER, MATTHEW (d. 1788 P), chemist and freethinker, was a man of unusual attainments. 'A good surgeon, a skilful anatomist, a practised chemist, a draughtsman, a classical scholar, and a ready wit, he formed one of a group of eminently intellectual men, who did much to foster a literary and artistic taste among the more educated classes at Liverpool' (MITEYARD, Life of Wedgwood, 1865, i. 300). In 1762, while residing at John Street in Liverpool, and practising as a surgeon, he was called on to attend Josiah Wedgwood [q. v.], and introduced him to Thomas Bentley (1731-1780) [q. v.]. He afterwards supplied Wedgwood with 'varnishes, fumigations, bronza powders, and other chemical appliances' for his establishment at Burslem (ib. ii. 16, 80). He also introduced Joseph Priestley [q. v.] to the subject of chemistry in a series of lectures delivered at Warrington about 1766 (RORT, Memoirs of Priestley, 1831, i. 76). He was one of the founders of the Liverpool Academy of Art in 1769, and in that year and afterwards, upon the two revivals of the academy in 1773 and 1783, he delivered lectures upon anatomy and the theory of forms (Hist. Soc. Lancashire and Cheshire, Proceedings and Papers, 1858-4, v. 147, vi. 71, 72).

Turner was a man of powerful and original mind. In politics he was not merely a whig, but a republican, and openly sympathised with the American colonies. He was also an atheist, and, though he did not venture to display his religious views with the same frankness, yet in 1782 he published 'An Answer to Dr. Priestley's Letters to a Philosophical Unbeliever,' London, 8vo, under the pseudonym of 'William Hammon,' in which he attacked Priestley's argument from design with considerable cogency. A new edition was published by Richard Carlile [q. v.] in 1826. Turner's attack drew from Priestley 'Additional Letters to a Philosophical Unbeliever,' 1782; 2nd edit. 1787. In 1787 Turner attested a codicil in the will of his friend John Wyke (ib. p. 75). His name does not appear in the Liverpool 'Directory' for 1790, so that it is possible he died between these two dates.

[Authorities cited above; information kindly given by the Rev. A. Gordon.] E. I. O.

TURNER, PETER, M.D. (1542-1614), physician, son of William Turner (d. 1508) [q. v.], the botanist, was born in 1542. He graduated M.A. at Cambridge, then proceeded M.D. at Heidelberg in 1571, and was incorporated M.D. in his own university in 1575 and 10 July 1599 at Oxford. He practised his profession in London, where, on 4 Dec. 1582, he was admitted a licentiate of the College of Physicians. He was promised on 4 May 1580 the reversion to the office of physician to St. Bartholomew's Hospital. He succeeded Dr. Rodrigo Lopez [q. v.], and was in 1584 succeeded by Dr. Timothy Bright [q. v.]. He represented Bridport in several of Elizabeth's parliaments (Off. Return), and is said to have zealously advocated the cause of the puritans in the House of Commons (STRYKE, Whitgift, i. 347). In 1600 he attended Sir Walter Raleigh in the Tower (Cal. State Papers, Dom. 1603-1610, p. 307). He married Pascha, daughter of Henry Parry, chancellor of Salisbury Cathedral, and sister of Henry Parry [q. v.], bishop of Worcester, and died in London on 27 May 1614. He is buried near his father in the church of St. Olave's, Hart Street, London, in a coloured tomb of the Jacobean style, on which his effigy kneels in a scarlet gown. Peter Turner (1586-1652) [q. v.] and Samuel Turner (d. 1647) [q. v.] were his sons.

He was the author of a pamphlet, 'The Opinion of Peter Turner, Doct. in Physicko, concerning Amulets, or Plague Cakes,' London, E. Blount, 1603, 4to (Brit. Mus.), and probably of 'A Spiritual Song of Praise' appended to Oliver Pygge's 'Meditations,' 1589, 4to.

[Munk's Coll. of Phys. i. 84; manuscript Journal of St. Bartholomew's Hospital; Stow's Survey of London, 1633.] N. M.

TURNER, PETER (1586-1652), mathematician, born in 1586, was the son of Peter Turner (1542-1614) [q. v.] and brother of Samuel Turner [q. v.]. Peter matriculated from St. Mary Hall, Oxford, on 31 Oct. 1600, graduated B.A. from Christ Church on 27 June 1605, was elected a fellow of Merton in 1607, and graduated M.A. on 9 March 1611-12. On 25 July 1620 he was appointed professor of geometry in Gresham College, in succession to Henry Briggs [q. v.]. In 1629, by the direction of Laud, he drew up the Caroline cycle to regulate the election of proctors from the various colleges. About the same date he also served upon a committee nominated to revise the university statutes and 'to reduce them to a better form and order.' On the death of Henry Briggs in January 1630-1, he succeeded him as Savilian professor of geometry at Oxford, resigning the Gresham professorship on 20 Feb.

On his appointment as chancellor of the university in 1631, Laud urged on the work of revising the statutes. The task was placed under the direction of Brian Twyns [q. v.], who received some assistance from Turner. The work of final revision was also entrusted to Turner, who was requested by Laud 'to polish the stile, methodise the book, and prepare it for the press' (cf. LAUD, Works, v. 84, 99, 163). The statutes were published in 1634. On 31 Aug. 1638, during a royal visit, the degree of M.D. was conferred upon Turner. This mark of the king's favour was either purchased or repaid by an ardent loyalty. In 1641 he was one of the first from Oxford to enlist under Sir John Byron [see BYRON, JOHN, first Lord Byron]. He was taken prisoner in a skirmish near Stow-on-the-Wold on 10 Sept., and imprisoned first in Banbury and later in Northampton, his effects at Oxford being seized when the town surrendered. In 1642 he was brought to London and imprisoned in Southwark, and in July 1643 he was exchanged for some parliamentary prisoners at Oxford (Journal of House of Commons, ii. 774, iii. 183). On 9 Nov. 1648 he was ejected by the parliamentary commissioners from his fellowship at Merton and from the Savilian professorship, in which he was succeeded by John Wallis (1616-1703) [q. v.]. Being reduced to great poverty, he sought refuge in Southwark with his sister, the widow of a brewer named Watts. At her house he died unmarried in January 1651-2, and was buried in the church of St. Saviour. 'He was,' says Wood, 'a most exact latinist and Grecian, was well skilled in the Hebrew and Arabic, was a thorough pac'd mathematician, was excellently well read in the fathers and councils, a most curious critic, a politician, statesman, and what not.' He was much valued by Laud, who would have advanced him to high place had he not preferred a student's life. He wrote much, but, owing to a severe habit of self-criticism, destroyed nearly all he wrote. Besides the preface to the statutes he was the author of a Latin poem in the 'Rodleiomnema,' Oxford, 1613.

[Wood's Athenæ Oxon. ed. Bliss, iii. 308; Wood's Hist. and Antiq. of the Univ. of Oxford, ed. Gutch, vol. ii. passim; Ward's Lives of the Professors of Gresham College, i. 129-35; Foster's Alumni Oxon. 1500-1714; Brodric's Hist. of Merton College, passim.] E. I. O.

TURNER, RICHARD (d. 1505?), protestant divine, born in Staffordshire, was educated at Magdalen College, Oxford, of which he became a fellow. He graduated B.A. on 19 July 1524, M.A. on 12 July 1529, and B.D. on 27 Jan. 1535-6, and supplicated for D.D. in 1551-2. On 25 Jan. 1535-6 he was elected to a perpetual chantry in the king's college at Windsor. He also became curate to Ralph Morice [q. v.], Cranmer's secretary, at Chatham (not, as often stated, Chartham) in Kent, where he distinguished himself by his neglect of catholic rites, and was appointed by Cranmer, to whom he was chaplain, one of the six preachers in Canterbury Cathedral (STRYP, Mem. of Cranmer, 1812, p. 147). In 1543 a bill of accusation was presented against him and others of Cranmer's chaplains and preachers at the sessions for not complying with the statute of the six articles; this attack was in reality levelled against Cranmer himself, who was assailed in person a little later. He, however, possessed the favour of the king, and the indictments in consequence came to nothing. Turner was at that time living in the family of Ralph Morice. He was a staunch supporter of the royal supremacy, and through the influence of Morice and the archbishop was able to avoid the dangers besetting an ecclesiastic under Henry VIII. On 1 July 1545 Turner was instituted to the vicarage of St. Stephen's-by-Saltash in Cornwall, and he has been doubtfully identified with the Richard Turner who was appointed rector of Clipping Ongar in Essex in 1544, and vicar of Hillingdon in Middlesex in 1545. In July 1549, during some popular commotions in Kent against the reforming party, Turner proceeded to the rioters' camp and preached against them, narrowly escaping being hanged for his boldness (ib. p. 395). On 24 Dec. 1551 he was appointed to a prebend at Windsor, and he also about this time obtained the vicarage of Dartford in Kent (STRYP, Eccles. Mem. 1832, II. i. 618). In the following year he was recommended by Cranmer for the archbishopric of Armagh, which, however, he declined, chiefly on the ground of his ignorance of the Irish language (STRYP, Cranmer, pp. 393, 398, 900). On the accession of Mary he fled to Basle, where he delivered lectures on the epistles to the Hebrews and to the Ephesians, and upon the general epistle of St. James, which were 'fit for the press,' according to Wood, in 1558, but were not published (ib. p. 395; STRYP, Eccles. Mem. III. i. 232). In 1555, while at Frankfort, he joined with other English refugees in publicly repudiating Knox's principles in regard to civil government. They took exception to several passages in Knox's 'Faythfull Admonition unto the profeseours of Gods Truthe in England,' assailing Mary, Philip, and the emperor Charles V. They drew the attention of the town authorities to Knox's sentiments, and he was in consequence expelled (ib. p. 406). Turner returned to England on the accession of Elizabeth, and in 1559 was restored to the vicarage of Dartford. In the following year he was selected by Parker as a visitor to reform abuses in the two Kentish dioceses. He probably died in 1565, when he was succeeded as vicar by John Appelbie.

Turner suggested to John Marbeck [q. v.], organist at Windsor, the compilation of his concordance of the English Bible which appeared in July 1550.

[Wood's Athenæ Oxon. i. 277; Foxe's Actes and Monuments, ed. Townsend, viii. 31-4; Foster's Alumni Oxon. 1500-1714; Archæologia Cant. xviii. 395; Macray's Reg. of Magdalen College, Oxford, 1897, ii. 54.] E. I. C.

TURNER, RICHARD (1753-1788), author, born in 1753, was the second son of Richard Turner (1724?-1791) [q. v.], by his wife Sarah, only sister of James Greene, barrister-at-law. He matriculated from Magdalen Hall (now Hertford College), Oxford, on 9 Feb. 1773. In 1778 he published 'An Heretical History, collected from the original authors,' London, 8vo, a compilation setting forth the origin and doctrines of the various heretical sects of the early Christian world. This was followed in 1780 by 'A New and Easy Introduction to Universal Geography' (London, 12mo), issued in the form of a series of letters. The work, which was of an elementary character, reached a thirteenth edition in 1808. Encouraged by the success of this sketch, he brought out three years later 'An Easy Introduction to the Arts and Sciences' (London, 1783, 12mo), which was equally popular, and, with various additions and alterations, continued a standard school textbook for some time, reaching a fourteenth edition in 1811. Turner died without issue at Bath on 22 Aug. 1788. He married the widow of Colonel Farrer.

Besides the works mentioned, he was the author of: 1. 'A View of the Earth as it was known to the Ancients,' London, 1779, 8vo. 2. 'An Epitome of Universal History,' London, 1787, 12mo.

[Turner's Works; Miscel. Geneal. et Herald., new ser. i. 158; Foster's Alumni Oxon. 1715-1886.] E. I. C.

TURNER, RICHARD (1724?-1791), divine and author, born in 1723 or 1724, was the son of Thomas Turner of Great Webby, Worcestershire. He matriculated from Magdalen Hall (now Hertford College), Oxford, on 14 July 1748. He became chaplain to the Countess Dowager of Winton, and on 11 June 1764 was instituted vicar of Elmley Castle in Worcestershire. On 19 June of the same year he was appointed rector of Little Comberton. In 1785 he received the honorary degree of LL.D. from Glasgow University. He died on 12 April 1791 and was buried at Norton-juxta-Kempsey in Worcestershire. He married Sarah, only sister of James Greene, a barrister, of Burford, Shropshire. She died in 1801. By her he had three sons—Thomas and Richard, who are separately noticed, and Edward, a general in the Indian army—and two daughters.

Turner was author of: 1. 'The Young Ganger's best Instructor,' London, 1762, 8vo. 2. 'A View of the Earth: a short but comprehensive System of Modern Geography,' London, 1762, 8vo. 3. 'Plain [sic] Trigonometry rendered easy and familiar by Calculations in Arithmetic only,' London, 1765, fol.; new ed. 1778. 4. 'View of the Heavens, being a System of Modern Astronomy,' London, 1783, fol. 5. 'The Young Geometrician's Companion,' London, 1787, 12mo. 6. 'An Account of a System of Education,' London, 1791, 8vo.

Turner's portrait, painted by Albert, was engraved by Stainier in 1787.

[Smith's Pedigree of the Turner Family, 1871, reprinted from Miscellaneous Geneal. et Herald., new ser., i. 168; Foster's Alumni Oxon. 1715-1886; Addison's Roll of Glasgow Graduates, 1897; Bromley's Cat. of Engr. Portraits, p. 370; Watt's Bibl. Brit.] E. I. O.

TURNER, ROBERT (d. 1599), Roman catholic divine, descended from a Scottish family, was born at Barnstaple, Devonshire. He was educated for a time at Exeter College, Oxford, and at Christ's College, Cambridge, whence he matriculated in 1567, but left each university without a degree. In after years he said: 'Non ego nuno, ut antea, statem meum in nugis (ne quid gravius dicam) Oxonii apud homines hæreseos crimino obstrictos, nequo in fabulis domi apud homines nulla politorum literatura excoltos, otiosos, turpiter, nequiter contererem' (Epistole, ed. 1615, p. 230). Leaving his country and parents on account of his attachment to the Roman catholic religion, he went in 1572 to the English College at Douai, where he became professor of rhetoric, and was ordained priest in 1574 (Douay Diaries, pp. 5, 6). In 1576 he went to Rome, and taught the classics for several years in the German College. He states that he was a pupil of Edmund Campion [q. v.], but whether at Oxford or Rome does not appear. He was never himself, as has been sometimes stated, a member of the Society of Jesus.

Turner was for some time prefect of studies at the college of Eichstadt in Bavaria; and, after many journeys and services undertaken for the Roman catholic cause, he was, by the influence of Cardinal Allen, appointed professor of eloquence and ethics in the Georgian College at Ingolstadt, where he was created D.D. Subsequently he became rector of that university. He was also nominated one of the privy council to William, duke of Bavaria; but, incurring that prince's displeasure, he retired for a time to Paris. A year or two later he returned to Germany, and was made canon of Breslau in Silesia, and afterwards secretary for the Latin tongue to the Archduke Ferdinand, who had an especial esteem for him. He died at Grätz in Styria on 28 Nov. 1599. His friend Pits describes him as 'vir in litteris politioribus et philosophia plus quam vulgariter doctus, et in familiari congressu satis superque facetus' (De Angliæ Scriptoribus, p. 799).

His works are: 1. 'Sermo Panegyricus de Divi Gregorii Nazianzeni corpore . . . translato,' Ingolstadt, 1584, 8vo. 2. 'Sermo Panegyricus de Triumpho, quo Bavarie Dux Ernestus, Archiepiscopus Coloniensis et Sacri Romani Imperii per Italiam Archicancellarius, Princeps Elector fuit inauguratus Episcopus Leodiensis,' Ingolstadt, 1584, 8vo. 3. 'Commentationes tres: (1) In illud Matthæi 23, Ecce mitto ad vos Prophetas, &c.; (2) In illud Actuum 2, Et factus est repente de cælo sonus, &c.; (3) In illud Johannis 1, Miserunt Judæi ab Hierosolymis, ut interrogarent eum, &c.' Ingolstadt, 1584, 8vo. 4. 'Epistolæ aliquot,' Ingolstadt, 1584, 8vo, dedicated to Cardinal Allen; another edition, 'additis centuriis duabus posthumis,' appeared at Cologne, 1615, 8vo. 5. 'Oratio et Epistola de vita et morte D. Martini à Schannberg Episcopi Eichstat,' Ingolstadt, 1580, 8vo. 6. 'Funobris Oratio in Principem Estonsem,' Antwerp, 1598. 7. 'Roberti Turneri Devonii Angli . . . Posthuma . . . Omnia nunc primum à m. s. edita,' Ingolstadt, 1602, 8vo. 8. 'Oratio de laude Ebrietatis, tempore Bacchanalium habita Duaci,' in 'Dornavii Amphitheatrum Sapientie Socraticæ Joosco-Sorici,' Hanover, 1619, fol. vol. ii. p. 38. A collected edition of Turner's works, containing several pieces not known to have been separately issued, was published as 'Roberti Turneri Devonii Oratoris et Philosophi Ingolstadiensis Panegyrici duo,' Ingolstadt, 1609, 8vo. A more complete collection was published at Cologne, 1615, 8vo.

[Tanner's Bibl. Brit. p. 728; Wood's Athenæ Oxon. (Bliss), i. 680; Strype's Annals, ii. 109, iii. 164, 318, 388; Fuller's Church Hist. bk. ix.; Oliver's Cornwall, p. 424.] T. O.

TURNER, ROBERT (A. 1654-1665), astrologer and botanist, was born at 'Hollshott' and matriculated from Christ's College, Cambridge, in 1636, graduating B.A. in 1639-40. In 1654 he published 'Μικρόκοσμος. A Description of the Little-World. Being a Discovery of the Body of Man,' London, 8vo. In 1657 he issued 'Ars Notoria: the Notary Art of Solomon,' London, 8vo, an astrological treatise, and in 1664 'Βοτανολογία. The British Physician: or, The Nature and Vertues of English Plants,' London, 8vo, a work chiefly devoted to the medicinal virtues of herbs, but containing much curious incidental information. A new edition with a portrait of Turner appeared in 1687. Turner's latest preface is dated from London in 1665, and it is possible that he was one of the victims of the plague in that year.

He was the author of the following translations: 1. 'Ἑσπεριον Ἀστρολογικόν. Astrological Opticks. Compiled at Venice by Johannes Regiomontanus and Johannes Angelus,' London, 1655, 8vo. 2. 'Henry Cornelius Agrippa his Fourth Book of Occult Philosophy,' London, 1655, 4to. 3. 'Paracelsus of the Supreme Myeteries of Nature,' London, 1656, 8vo. 4. 'The Compleat Bone-setter, written originally by Frier Moulton,' London, 1656, 8vo; 2nd ed. 1665, with portrait [see MOULTON, THOMAS]. 5. 'Sal Lumen, et Spiritus Mundi Philoeopieci. Written originally in French, afterwards turned into Latin by Lodovicus Combachius,' London, 1657, 8vo. 6. 'Paracelsus of the Chymical Transmutation, Genealogy, and Generation of Metals, London, 1657, 8vo.

[Oranger's Biogr. Hist. iv. 89; Pulteney's Progress of Botany in England, i. 180; Notes and Queries, 1st ser. xi. 467.] E. I. C.

TURNER, SAMUEL (d. 1647P), royalist, was the elder son of Peter Turner (1542-1614) [q. v.]. Peter Turner (1585-1651) [q. v.] was his younger brother. Samuel was admitted B.A. from St. Mary Hall, Oxford, on 11 Feb. 1601-2, and was licensed M.A. from St. Alban Hall on 22 Oct. 1604. He graduated M.D. at the university of Padua in 1611 (Sloane MS. 1729). On 16 Feb. 1625-6 he was returned to parliament for the borough of Shaftesbury in Dorset, and on 11 March he distinguished himself by an attack on Buckingham, telling the House of Commons that 'that great man the Duke of Buckingham' was the cause of all their grievances. In a series of questions he boldly accused him of having neglected to guard the seas against pirates, of having caused the failure of the Cadiz expedition by the appointment of unworthy officers, of having engrossed a large part of the crown lands, and of having sold places of judicature and titles of honour. He referred further to the recusancy of Buckingham's father and mother, and declared that it was unfit that he should enjoy so many great offices (Addit. MS. 22474, f. 11; cf. GARDINER, Hist. of England, vi. 76-7). On 14 March Charles sent a message to the house demanding justice on Turner. Turner was ordered by the commons to explain his words, which he did by letter, and was prevented from taking further share in parliamentary proceedings by a timely illness. He was not returned to the next parliament, nor to the Short parliament of 1640; but he resumed his seat in the Long parliament. On 3 May 1641 he was included among the fifty-nine members whose names were posted up by the mob as 'Straffordians, betrayers of their country,' because they had voted against Strafford's attainder (VERNEY, Notes of Proceedings in the Long Parl., Camden Soc., p. 55). On the outbreak of the civil war he took up arms for the king, and obtained a captain's commission. About the end of 1643 he defeated the parliamentarians in a skirmish at Henley. An account of the action which he sent his brother, then a prisoner in London, was published under the title 'A true Relation of a late Skirmish at Henley upon Thames.' On 24 Jan. 1643-4 he was disabled from sitting in the Long parliament for 'being in the king's quarters and adhering to that party' (Journals of the House of Commons, iii. 574). He sat for Shaftesbury in Charles's parliament at Oxford until its dispersal, and on 21 Nov. 1646 petitioned to compound, and was allowed to purge his delinquency by a fine. He died about 1647, leaving a natural son, Samuel Turner.

[Wood's Fasti Oxon. ed. Bliss, i. 303; Notes and Queries, 7th ser. xii. 428; Foster's Alumni Oxon. 1600-1714; Official Return of Members of Parliament, i. 469, 488.] E. I. C.

TURNER, SAMUEL (1749P-1802), Asiatic traveller, born in Gloucestershire about 1749, was a kinsman of Warren Hastings. He was given an East India cadetship in 1780, appointed ensign the same year, lieutenant on 8 Aug. 1781, captain on 8 June 1796, and regimental captain on 18 March 1799. He was known as the author of the only published account of a journey to Great Tibet written by an Englishman until Bogle and Manning's narratives were printed in 1875. News having reached Calcutta, in February 1782, of the reincarnation of the Tashi-lhunpo grand lama of Tibet (Bogle and Turner's Teshoo Lama of Teshoo Loomboo) in the person of a child, Warren Hastings proposed the despatch of a mission to Tibet to congratulate the lamaist regency on the event, and strengthen the friendly relations established by George Bogle [q. v.], who had died on 3 April 1781, and, with the assent of the court of directors, Turner was appointed on 9 Jan. 1783 chief of the mission. Leaving Calcutta shortly afterwards, and following the route previously taken by Bogle, Turner reached the summer palace of the Deb Raja of Bhutan early in June 1783, stayed till 8 Sept. in this country, and then proceeded, still following Bogle's route, to Tashi-lhunpo, a monastery in the neighbourhood of Shigatze, arriving there on 22 Sept. 1783. On 4 Dec. at Ter-pa-ling, he had an audience of the infant Tashi lama, who, he was told, could understand what was said to him. The envoy accordingly stated that 'the governor-general, on receiving news of his decease in China, was overwhelmed with grief and sorrow, and continued to lament his absence from the world until the cloud that had overcast the happiness of this nation was dispelled by his reappearance' (TURNER, Embassy, p. 384). 'The little creature,' Turner adds, 'looked steadfastly towards me, with the appearance of much attention while I spoke, and nodded with repeated but slow movements of the head, as though he understood every word, but could not utter a reply. His parents, who stood by all the time, eyed their son with a look of affection, and a smile expressive of heartfelt joy, at the propriety of the young lama's conduct. . . . Teshoo Lama was at this time eighteen months old.' Returning to India by the same route, Turner joined the governor-general's camp at Patna in March 1784, and at once proceeded to submit a report of his mission, which was afterwards reprinted in the appendix to his larger work.

Turner was among the officers with Lord Cornwallis on the night of 6 Feb. 1792 (DROM). In 1794 he served at the siege of Seringapatam in command of a troop of the governor-general's (Cornwallis) bodyguard of cavalry. In 1798 he was a captain in the company's 3rd European regiment, and, going on furlough to Europe, purchased a country seat in Gloucestershire. The name of Samuel Turner is among the list of persons who received pensions and gratuities in 1800, on the recommendation of Lord Cornwallis, when viceroy in Ireland. On 15 Jan. 1801 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society. On 21 Dec. 1801, while walking at night in the neighbourhood of Fetter Lane, London, he was seized with a paralytic stroke, and was taken to the work-house in Shoe Lane. His name and address in St. James's Place were presently discovered; but he was too ill to be moved, and died on 2 Jan. 1802. He was buried in St. James's church, Piccadilly. His property in Gloucestershire went to his sisters, one of whom married Joseph White, regius professor of Hebrew at Oxford.

He wrote 'An Account of an Embassy to the Court of the Teshoo Lama in Tibet, containing a Narrative of a Journey through Bootan and part of Tibet,' London, 1800, 4to; a French translation appeared at Paris in 1800, and a German translation by Sprengel at Berlin and Hamburg next year.

[Bengal Kalendars; Dirom's Narrative of the Campaign in India in 1792-98; Cent. Mag. 1802, i. 87; Bogle and Manning's Tibet, ed. Markham.] S. W.

TURNER, SAMUEL (1765-1810), Irish informer, born in 1765, was the son of Jacob Turner of Turner's Glen, near Newry, a gentleman of good fortune in co. Armagh. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, where he entered on 2 July 1780, graduating B.A. in 1784, and LL.D. in 1787. Turner was called to the Irish bar in 1788, but does not seem to have practised, and became involved in the United Irish movement. He was closely associated with the northern leaders of the United Irishmen, and was a member of the executive committee when its principal leaders were arrested in 1798. Turner had escaped to the continent early in 1797, and spent the next few years at Hamburg, where he maintained the most intimate relations with the Irish patriots. He was included in the act of attainder in 1798 as one concerned in the rebellion; but in 1803, on the death of his father, he returned to Ireland, and appeared at the bar of the king's bench, when the attainder was reversed, with the assent of the attorney-general, on proof of Turner's absence from Ireland for upwards of a year prior to the outbreak of the insurrection. Thenceforward he continued to reside in Dublin until his death, preserving to the end the reputation of a patriot among the popular party in Ireland, and enjoying the friendship of Daniel O'Connell.

The industry of Mr. W. J. Fitzpatrick has, however, conclusively established the treachery of Turner to the cause he espoused, and has identified him with the mysterious visitor to Lord Downshire mentioned by Froude in his 'English in Ireland' as having in 1797 betrayed important secrets to the Irish government, and with 'Richardson,' 'Furnes,' and other aliases under which he was known to the government, and by which he is mentioned in the 'Castlereagh Correspondence,' and elsewhere. For his services as an informer Turner was awarded a secret pension of 300*l.* a year by the government, which was subsequently increased to 500*l.* Sir Arthur Wellesley mentions him in a letter, dated 5 Dec. 1807, as having 'strong claims to the favour of the government for the loyalty and zeal with which he conducted himself during the rebellion in Ireland.' According to Mr. Fitzpatrick, Turner was killed in the Isle of Man in a duel with one Boyce (FITZPATRICK, Secret Service under Pitt, p. 104). The exact date of his death is unknown. It is believed to have been 1810.

[W. J. Fitzpatrick's Secret Service under Pitt; Froude's English in Ireland; Madden's Lives of the United Irishmen, Civil Correspondence of the Duke of Wellington.] C. L. F.

TURNER, SHARON (1768-1847), historian, was born in Pentonville on 24 Sept. 1768. Both his parents were natives of Yorkshire, and had emigrated to London on their marriage. Sharon was educated at Dr. James Davis's academy in Pentonville, and was articled in 1783 to an attorney in the Temple. His master died without an heir in 1789, but, with the support of some of the leading clients, Turner was enabled to carry on the business. In 1795 he married and removed to Red Lion Square. When still quite a boy, a translation of the 'Death Song of Ragnar Lodbrok,' which he had probably come across in Percey's 'Five Pieces of Runic Poetry' (1763), attracted his attention to the old northern literature, and he began the study of Icelandic and Anglo-Saxon. He was surprised at the backward state of the philology of these languages and at the neglect which all the ancient materials had experienced at the hands of previous historians, such as Hume (1761). He soon got into the habit of spending every hour he could spare from professional work at the British Museum, and he was the first to explore for historical purposes the Anglo-Saxon manuscripts in the Cottonian Library. Encumbered as he was by the wealth of new material, he kept a clearly defined purpose ever before him. As the result of sixteen years' study he produced in 1799 the first instalment of his 'History of England from the earliest period to the Norman Conquest,' of which the fourth volume appeared in 1805 (2nd ed. 2 vols. 4to, 1807; 5th ed. 3 vols. 8vo, 1828; Paris, 1840; Philadelphia, 1841; 7th ed., revised by the author's son, 1852). Almost as complete a revelation in its way as the discoveries of Leyard, the work elicited from the omniscient Southey the opinion 'that so much information was probably never laid before the public in one historical publication' (SOUTHEY, Life and Correspondence, chap. xi.) It was also commended by Palgrave in the 'Edinburgh Review.' An assault upon the authenticity of some of the ancient British poems cited by Turner drew from him a 'Vindication of the genuineness of the Antient British Poems of Aneurin, Taliesin, Llywarch Hen, and Merddin, with Specimens of the Poems' (London, 1803, 8vo).

Turner decided to continue his history upon the same lines of independent research among the original authorities, and produced between 1814 and 1823 his 'History of England from the Norman Conquest to 1509' (3 vols. 4to; 2nd ed. 5 vols. 1825; 5th ed. 1828). Lingard's 'History of England' appeared in eight volumes between 1819 and 1830, and, with the object of controverting some of Lingard's positions, Turner wrote the 'History of the Reign of Henry VIII; comprising the political history of the commencement of the English Reformation' (1826, 4to; 3rd ed. 1828). The work was in 1829 brought down to 1603 in the 'History of the Reigns of Edward VI, Mary, and Elizabeth,' and was finally issued in a uniform series as 'The History of England' from the earliest time to the death of Queen Elizabeth, in twelve octavo volumes, 1839. The later portion of the work failed to sustain Turner's reputation, and even the friendly Southey expressed with frankness the wish that the style had been less ambitious. Where the field was less new he had fewer advantages over previous writers; his views had little originality, and his treatment of his subject had no superior merit.

In 1829, intense application having considerably impaired his health, Turner retired from business and settled at Windermere Hill. There he prepared and issued in 1832 the first volume of his 'Sacred History of the World as displayed in the Creation and subsequent events to the Deluge, attempted to be philosophically considered in a series of letters to a son' (London, 1832, 8 vols. 8vo; 8th ed. 1848). The work owed its popularity largely to the author's homiletic manner and devoutly orthodox attitude. After much searching of spirit Turner had risen superior to the sceptical suggestions of the school of Voltaire, and he now showed himself completely impervious to the new German criticism. He had been greatly shocked in 1830 by Milman's lax views as regards miracles in the 'History of the Jews.' Milman retorted that he should have valued Turner's opinion more highly twenty years ago.

Turner issued a couple of small pamphlets in 1818 advocating the modification of the Copyright Act of Anne, and in 1819 he published a volume of verse entitled 'Prolegomena on the present Greatness of Britain and on Modern Poetry' (London, 12mo), which does honour to his patriotic sentiments. His remaining essay in verse, which he was busy in elaborating between 1792 and 1838, was a diemally long and half-hearted kind of apology for 'Richard the Third,' which was judiciously rejected by Murray, but eventually printed by Longman in 1845. The fact recorded by Jerdan that Turner was a constant friend and patron of the Rev. Robert Montgomery (best known as 'Satan' Montgomery) receives corroboration from this 'epic.'

Of greater literary interest was Turner's intimate business association with John Murray (1778-1848) [q. v.] Murray consulted him frequently on legal questions touching literary property, and more particularly in connection with the literary outlaw 'Don Juan,' from whom it was feared the British law would withhold the protection of copyright. Turner's services as a solicitor were also of value in steering the newly launched 'Quarterly' into a safe channel and averting the perils of libel actions. He deprecated attempts to emulate the smart severity of the 'Edinburgh,' and enunciated the principle that 'harmless inoffensive work' should be compassionately treated. He himself contributed two or three articles to the early numbers. In 1843 Turner suffered a great blow from the loss of his wife, a lady whom John Murray met in 1807 with the reputation of being 'one of the Godwin school.' 'If,' he says, 'they all be as beautiful, accomplished, and agreeable as this lady, they must be a damned dangerous set indeed.' Early in 1847 he returned to London, and he died under his son's roof in Red Lion Square on 13 Feb. 1847. Turner, who was an F.S.A. and an associate of the Royal Society of Literature, had been in receipt of a civil list pension (of 300*l.*) since 1835. His youngest son, Sydney, is briefly noticed below; his third daughter, Mary (d. 1870), married William Ellis (1800-1881) [q. v.] Turner was intimate with Isaac Disraeli, and godfather of his son Benjamin. Turner's Anglo-Saxon work stands in something of the same relation to the revival of the study in history as Horace Walpole's 'castle' at Strawberry Hill to the later revival of Gothic architecture. His critical power was perhaps defective, but it must not be forgotten that his work first occupied a great field. He not only felt an enthusiasm for the subject, but had a genuine power of presentation (his weakness for the complicated sentence having been much exaggerated); and, in addition to the respect of scholars such as Hallam and Southey, he won the abiding interest of Scott, and later of Tennyson. Reference is sparingly made to his work at the present day, but it may well be doubted whether the advance which he made upon Hume was not greater than that made upon his 'History' in the works of Thorpe and Lappenberg, Palgrave and Kemble.

The historian's youngest son, SYDNEY TURNER (1814-1870), born in 1814, was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, whence he graduated B.A. as eighteenth wrangler in 1836. He was ordained two years later by the bishop of Winchester, and held for some years the curacy of Christ Church, Southwark, after which he became head of the reformatory school of the Philanthropic Society at Red Hill. He rapidly identified himself with a zealous attempt to ameliorate the sternly repressive treatment meted out to juvenile offenders, and published in 1855 an optimistic pamphlet upon 'Reformatory Schools' which had a wide circulation. In 1857 he was appointed inspector of reformatories in England and Scotland, a position which he retained down to the close of 1875, when he was nominated dean of Ripon. He resigned this post within a year of his appointment, and retired to the rectory of Hempsted in Gloucestershire, where he died on 26 June 1879 (Ann. Register, 1879; Times, 3 July 1879).

[Gent. Mag. 1847, i. 434-6; Annual Register, 1847; Smiles's Memoir of John Murray, 1891, passim; Addit. MS. 16951 ff. 14 sq. (letters to H. Colburn); Jerdan's Men I have known, pp. 423-8 (with autograph facsimile); Pantheon of the Age, 1804; Britton's Autobiography, p. 8; Stephen's Life and Letters of Freeman, 1895, i. 114; Southey's Life and Correspondence; Prescott's Miscellanies, 1856, p. 101; Dibdin's Literary Companion, p. 246; Disraeli's Literary Character, ch. xxv.; Caroline Fox's Memories, 1832; Retrospective Review, vol. viii.; Allibone's Dict. of English Literature; English Cyclopædia—Biography; Brit. Mus. Cat.] T. S.

TURNER, THOMAS (1691-1672), dean of Canterbury, born at Reading in 1691, was the son of Thomas Turner of Heckfield in Hampshire, mayor of Reading. He matriculated from St. John's College, Oxford, on 28 June 1610, graduating B.A. on 6 June 1614 and M.A. on 9 May 1618. He was elected a fellow, took the degree of B.D. on 20 July 1624, and was created D.D. on 1 April 1638. In 1628 he was presented by his college to the vicarage of St. Giles's, Oxford, which he held with his fellowship, but relinquished in 1629. Laud, when bishop of London, made him his chaplain and licenser; he had much regard for him, and bequeathed him his 'ring with a diamond, and the garter about it' (Laud, Works, 1864, iv. 270, 444). On 7 Jan. 1627-8 Turner was appointed a member of the commission for ecclesiastical causes (Cal. State Papers, Dom. 1627-8, p. 508); and on 14 April 1629 Laud collated him to the prebend of Newington in St. Paul's cathedral. On 29 Oct. following he was collated chancellor of London, and soon after was appointed chaplain in ordinary to the king. In May 1631 he obtained the rectory of St. Augustine-in-the-Gate, but exchanged it on 10 Nov. for that of Southwark. In 1638 he accompanied Charles in his Scottish coronation progress, and on 17 Dec. of the same year his name appears in the commission for exercising ecclesiastical jurisdiction in England and Wales (ib. 1638-4, p. 576). On 11 Nov. 1634 he was instituted rector of Fechem in Surrey; on 31 Dec. 1638 he and John Juxon received from the king the lease of the prebend and rectory of Aylesbury for five years (ib. 1638-9 p. 161, 1640 p. 11); and 16 Feb. 1641-2 he was nominated dean of Rochester (ib. 1640-1, pp. 502-3). On 3 Jan. 1643-4 he was constituted dean of Canterbury, a nominal office, as Kent was in the hands of parliament. He adhered to the king with great devotion, and attended him at Hampton Court and during his imprisonment in the Isle of Wight. During the parliamentary ascendancy and in the time of the Commonwealth he was much harassed and deprived of all his benefices. Three of his houses were plundered, his books seized, and he himself arrested at Fechem by a party of horse for having sent 120*l.* to the king. He was forcibly dragged away while holding divino service and carried to the White Lion prison in Southwark.

At the Restoration he regained his Surrey rectories, and entered into possession of the deanery of Canterbury. It is said he declined the offer of a bishopric, 'preferring to set out with too little than too much sail.' Shortly after he resigned the rectory of Fechem, and, dying on 8 Oct. 1672, was buried in the dean's chapel in Canterbury Cathedral, where a mural monument was erected to his memory. He married Margaret, daughter of Sir Francis Windebank [q. v.], principal secretary of state to Charles I. By her he had three sons, Francis Turner [q. v.], non-juring bishop of Ely; Thomas Turner (1645-1714) [q. v.], president of Corpus Christi College, Oxford; and William Turner (1647-1686), archdeacon of Durham.

[Chalmers's Biogr. Dict. 1816; Manning's Hist. of Surrey, ed. Bray, i. 486, iii. 606; Le Neve's Fasti Eccles.; Hackett's Select and Remarkable Epitaphs, 1767, i. 282; Foster's Alumni Oxon. 1500-1714; Wood's Fasti Oxon. ed. Bliss, i. 472; Newcourt's Repertorium, i. 115, 189; Walker's Sufferings of the Clergy, ii. 6; Hasted's Hist. of Kent, ii. 28, iv. 538, 605; Lansdowne MS. 986, ff. 160-81.]

E. I. C.

TURNER, THOMAS (1645-1714), president of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, second son of Thomas Turner (1591-1672) [q. v.], was born at Bristol on 19 or 20 Sept. 1645. He was a younger brother of Francis Turner [q. v.], bishop of Ely. Thomas originally matriculated at Hart Hall on 10 May 1662, but on 6 Oct. 1663 he was admitted to a Gloucestershire scholarship at Corpus, of which he became fellow in 1672. He graduated B.A. on 16 March 1666-6, M.A. in 1669, B.D. in 1677, and D.D. in 1683. From 1672 to 1695 he was vicar of Milton, near Sittingbourne, Kent, and from 1680 to 1689 rector of Thorley, Hertfordshire. He became rector of Fulham, Middlesex, in 1688, archdeacon of Essex in 1690, canon of Ely in 1686, canon of St. Paul's in 1682, and precentor in 1690. These accumulated preferments, except the sinecure rectory of Fulham and the canonry and precentorship of St. Paul's, he resigned at or shortly after his election to the presidency of Corpus, an event which occurred on 18 March 1687-8. The election, which took place within a week of his predecessor's death, was possibly hurried on in order to diminish the chances of any interference from the court of James II. On the accession of William III he did not, like his brother Francis, refuse to take the oaths; but many circumstances, coupled with the ascription to him of the title 'honest man' by Hearn, make it plain that he had Jacobite proclivities. It is not, however, true, as insinuated by Whiston, and, after him, stated positively by Bentham in his 'History of Ely' and Alexander Chalmers in his 'Biographical Dictionary,' that he skilfully evaded taking the oaths so as to retain his preferments. Hearn, who seemed disposed to accept the story and had actually written in his 'Diary,' 'He is said never to have taken the oaths to King William and Queen Mary and the present Queen Anne, which, if so, it makes me have a much better opinion of him,' adds subsequently in the margin: 'Tis a mistake. He took all the oaths, as appears since his death.' This positive statement by Hearne and the silence of Wood (see Wood's Life and Times, ed. Clark, iii. 307) seem completely to dispose of the allegation.

Turner appears to have ruled his college well, wisely, and peaceably; and under his administration it rapidly regained the efficiency and reputation which had been impaired under his predecessor, the restored president, Robert Newlyn [q.v.] Being both rich and generous, he seems to have spent his money freely on college objects. In 1700, with rare munificence and much taste, he set about the erection of the handsome pile of buildings which faces the college garden and Christ Church meadow, formerly called Turner's and now called the Fellows' buildings, the design, it is said, being given by Dean Aldrich. They were completed in 1712, and, according to Hearne, cost about 4,000*l.*, a sum which, in the altered value of the precious metals, would of course now be represented by a much larger amount.

Turner died on 29 April 1714, and is buried in the college chapel, where, as also at Stowe Nine Churches in Northamptonshire, there is a lengthy inscription, the main contents of which relate to the disposal of his property. After providing for his relatives, for the college—to which, among other legacies, he bequeaths his whole 'study of books,' many of them very rare and valuable—and for various other objects, he leaves the residue of his property, which he thinks will be 'pretty considerable' (said on the monuments at Corpus and Stowe Nine Churches, where his executors bought a large estate, to have amounted to 20,000*l.*), to be settled upon 'the governors and trustees of the corporation for the relief of poor clergymen's widows and orphans,' i.e. the corporation which, originally founded in 1655, now goes by the name of the 'Corporation of the Sons of the Clergy.' Thus Turner may almost be said to be a second founder of this society.

The only publication bearing Turner's name is a single sermon preached at Whitehall on 29 May 1685 before James II, to whom he was chaplain. In this sermon there is an acute criticism of Hobbes's position, that a 'state of nature is a state of war.' But in the Bodleian Library there are some fragments of manuscript sermons (Rawlinson MSS. O. 626) which seem to be of a plain practical character; and also two printed tracts, published anonymously, which are attributed to him. The two latter are entitled respectively 'The Christian Enchanter no Proper Sacrifice' (London, 1714), and 'A Defence of the Doctrins and Practice of the Church of England against some Modern Innovations' (London, 1712). If these tracts were really written by Turner, they show unmistakably that not only was he not romishly inclined, but that he had no sympathy with the extreme high-church developments of the nonjurors.

[Fowler's History of Corpus Christi College, pp. 281-72; Registers of O. C. C.; Hearne's Diaries, under 4 Dec. 1706, 7 May 1708, and 20 April 1714; Whiston's Memoirs, 2nd edit. pp. 178-86; Foster's Alumni Oxon.; Turner's will and codicil in the Oxford University Archives.] T. F.

TURNER, THOMAS (1749-1809), potter, born in 1749, was the eldest son of Richard Turner (1724?-1791) [q.v.], vicar of Elmley Castle, Worcestershire, by his wife Sarah. Richard Turner (1758-1788) [q.v.] was his younger brother. It has been supposed that Thomas was brought up as a silversmith. He was, however, only formally apprenticed to his father, to qualify him for the freedom of the city of Worcester. It is probable that he was early connected with the Worcester china works. He was an excellent chemist, was a thorough master of the various processes connected with porcelain manufacture, was a skilful draughtsman, designer, and engraver, and was also a clever musician. He was a magistrate for Shropshire and Staffordshire, and a freeman of Worcester, Much Wenlock, and Bridgnorth. In 1772 he succeeded his father-in-law, Gallimore, at his pottery works at Caughley in Shropshire. The works, which were styled 'The Salopian China Warehouse,' had gained some repute as early as 1750. The earlier goods produced were not many degrees removed from earthenware, but gradually they assumed 'a finer and more transparent character. Like the early Worcester examples, the patterns were principally confined to blue flowers, &c., on a white ground; and in this style and colour' the goods in many respects excelled any contemporary productions.

On succeeding Gallimore, Turner set about enlarging the manufactory. He completed his improvements in 1775, and in 1780 visited France, in order to investigate the methods employed in the porcelain manufactories at Paris. He brought back several skilled workmen, who greatly aided him in his subsequent innovations. Immediately on his return he introduced to England the famous 'willow pattern,' and about the same time the 'Brosely blue dragon pattern.' In 1798 or 1799 Turner retired from the business, which passed into the hands of John Rose, a former apprentice, who carried it on, with his own works at Coalport, under the title Rose & Co. The works were finally abandoned in 1814 or 1815, chiefly owing to difficulties of transport and to the failure of the coal supply.

Turner died in February 1809, and was buried in the family vault at Barrow. He was twice married: first, in 1783, to Dorothy Gallimore. She died in 1793 without surviving issue; and he was married, secondly, in 1796, to Mary, daughter of Thomas Milner and widow of Henry Alsop. She died at Bridgnorth on 20 Nov. 1816, leaving a son and daughter.

[Misc. Gen. et Herald. new ser. i. 158; Jewitt's Ceramic Pottery, 1883, pp. 153-64; Chaffers's Marks and Monograms on Pottery and Porcelain, 1897, pp. 740-2; Marryatt's Hist. of Pottery and Porcelain, 1868, p. 400; Art Journal, March 1862.] E. I. C.

TURNER, THOMAS (1793-1873), surgeon, youngest child of Edmund Turner, banker, of Truro, and of Joanna, his wife, daughter of Richard Ferris, was born at Truro on 13 Aug. 1793. He was educated at the grammar school of his native town during the head-mastership of Cornelius Cardew, and was afterwards apprenticed to Nehemiah Duck, one of the surgeons to St. Peter's Hospital, Bristol. Turner left Bristol at the end of his apprenticeship for London, where, in the autumn of 1815, he entered as a student under (Sir) Astley Paston Cooper [q.v.] at the united borough hospitals of Guy and St. Thomas. He was admitted a licentiate of the Society of Apothecaries and a member of the College of Surgeons of England in 1816, and proceeded to Paris, where he spent a year. He became a member of several French societies, and seems to have wished to take the degree of doctor of medicine at Paris; but in 1817 he was appointed house surgeon at the infirmary of Manchester. He held the post until September 1820, when illness forced him to resign. After a short holiday, which he devoted to visiting the medical school at Edinburgh, he settled in Manchester, occupying a house in Piccadilly. He was almost immediately appointed secretary to the Manchester Natural History Society, and he was also elected a member of the Manchester Literary and Philosophical Society, where he was brought much into contact with John Dalton (1766-1844) [q.v.]; on 18 April 1823 he was elected one of the six councillors of the society.

On 1 Nov. 1822 he delivered in the rooms of the Literary and Philosophical Society the first of a series of lectures upon the anatomy, physiology, and pathology of the human body. The lectures were highly appreciated. Several similar courses were afterwards given, and in 1824 Turner delivered an address in which he developed the plan of establishing in Manchester a school of medicine and surgery. The suggestion was well received, and in October 1824 a suitable building was engaged and opened in Pine Street, where Dalton gave a course of lectures on pharmaceutical chemistry. A medico-surgical society for students was also established, and in 1825 the school was thoroughly organised. Thus arose the first of the great provincial schools of medicine in England. Detached courses of lectures had indeed been given to medical students in Bristol, Liverpool, and Manchester before 1825, but they had never been recognised by the examining bodies of the country, and all students had been compelled to spend a part of their time either in London or in Edinburgh before they could obtain a license to practise. The Edinburgh College of Surgeons recognised the course of instruction given at Manchester in February 1825; the English college was more tardy, but by Astley Cooper's instrumentality and Turner's perseverance a reluctant consent was at length obtained. Sir James McGrigor (1771-1858) [q.v.], on behalf of the medical department of the navy and army, recognised the course 20 Aug. 1827.

Turner was appointed surgeon to the Deaf and Dumb Institution in 1826. He removed shortly after his marriage in 1828 from Piccadilly to a house in the upper part of King Street, and in the autumn of 1830 to Mosley Street, where he lived the rest of his life. In August 1830 he was elected a surgeon to the Royal Infirmary at Manchester, and he soon acquired an important practice. On 31 July 1832 he laid the foundation of a new and larger lecture-theatre, which was duly opened in the following October. The school progressed steadily under Turner's control, and the succeeding few years witnessed the dissolution of the Mount Street and Marston Street schools of medicine and the increasing growth of the Pine Street school, at which he was the moving spirit. The medical school in Chatham Street entered into an agreement with the Pine Street school in 1859, and the Royal School of Medicine thus came into existence, while in 1872 the Royal school of medicine was amalgamated with the Owens College as its medical faculty. Turner was invited to give the inaugural address, and a sum of money was set apart under the name of the 'Turner Medical Prize' in commemoration of his services.

In 1843 Turner was appointed honorary professor of physiology at the Manchester Royal Institution, where, with the exception of two years, he delivered annually a course of lectures until 1873. He was nominated a fellow of the Royal College of Surgeons of England in 1843, and he served on its council from 1865 to 1873. He was much occupied from 1852 with the Sanitary Association of Manchester and Salford in endeavouring to improve the intellectual, moral, and social condition of the factory hands. He died in Manchester on Wednesday, 17 Dec. 1873, and was buried in the churchyard of Marton, near Skipton-in-Craven. On 8 March 1826 he married Anna, daughter of James Clarke, esq., of Medham, near Newport, Isle of Wight.

Turner assisted greatly in breaking up that monopoly of medical education possessed by the London medical schools at the beginning of this century. He showed that the large provincial towns were as capable of affording a first-rate medical education to their students as was the metropolis. Turner likewise recognised the fundamental principle of estate medicine, that improvement in sanitary surroundings necessarily implies improvement in the moral atmosphere of the inhabitants.

Turner published: 1. 'Outlines of a System of Medico-Chirurgical Education,' London and Manchester, 1824, 8vo; 2nd edit. 1820. 2. 'An Address to the Inhabitants of Lancashire, &c., on the Present State of the Medical Profession,' London, 1825, 8vo. 3. 'A Practical Treatise on the Arterial System,' London, 1825, 8vo. 4. 'Outlines of a Course of Lectures on the Laws of Animal Life,' Manchester, 1825, 8vo. 5. 'Outlines of a Course of Lectures on the Anatomy, Physiology, and Pathology of the Human Body,' Manchester, 1833, 8vo. 6. 'Anatomico-Chirurgical Observations on Dislocations of the Astragalus,' Worcester, 1843, 8vo.

[Mémoir of Thomas Turner, esq., by a Relative, London, 1876, 8vo; additional information kindly given by the late Ed. Lund, esq., consulting surgeon to the Manchester Royal Infirmary.] D.A. P.

TURNER, THOMAS HUDSON (1815-1852), antiquary, born in London in 1815, was the eldest son of Thomas Turner, a printer in the employ of William Bulmer [q. v.] The elder Turner was a man of culture, possessed considerable knowledge of English literature, and assisted William Gifford (1756-1826) [q. v.] in his edition of 'Ben Jonson' with many valuable suggestions.

The younger Turner lost his father at an early age. He was left in poverty and received assistance from Bulmer and from Bulmer's nephew William Nicol. He was educated at a school in Chelsea, where he was distinguished by his thirst for literary and antiquarian knowledge. In his sixteenth year he entered Nicol's office, and devoted his leisure to the pursuit of his favourite studies, but he soon obtained a post at the record office in the Tower, where he read and translated records. Taking advantage of his new opportunities for research, he commenced a history of England during the reigns of John and Henry III, which he did not complete. His labours were finally interrupted by his entering into an undertaking to collect materials for a history of London for Edward Tyrrell, the city remembrancer. In 1841 he edited for the Roxburghe Club 'Manners and Household Expenses of England in the Thirteenth and Fifteenth Centuries' (London, 4to), to which he wrote an admirable introduction. Subsequently for a short time he was resident secretary of the Archaeological Institute. His principal work was entitled 'Some Account of Domestic Architecture in England from the Conquest to the end of the Thirteenth Century' (Oxford, 1851-1859, 3 vols. 8vo. The concluding portion, continuing the history from Edward I to Henry VIII, was by John Henry Parker [q. v.]) The book deals with a wide range of subjects, including furniture and household implements. Turner died in Stanhope Terrace, Camden Town, on 17 Jan. 1862. He contributed many papers to the 'Archæological Journal,' and made several communications to the Society of Antiquaries of Newcastle, printed in the third volume of 'Archæologia Æliana;' he also wrote an introduction to Lewis's 'Life of Fisher' (1856).

[Cont. Mag. 1862, i. 206; English Cyclopædia.] E. I. C.

TURNER, SIR TOMKYN SMITH GROVE (1766?-1848), general, was born about 1766. He obtained a commission as ensign in the 3rd foot guards on 20 Feb. 1782, and was promoted to be lieutenant and captain on 13 Oct. 1789. He went to Holland in February 1793 with the brigade of guards under Frederick, duke of York, landed at Helvoetsluys on 5 March, marched to Tournay, in May camped at Maulde, took part in the battle of St. Amant (8 May), the action of Famars (23 May), the siege of Valenciennes in June and July, the assault of that place on 25 July, and its capitulation on the 28th. In August Turner marched with the British force to lay siege to Dunkirk, and on this way was present at the brilliant affair at Lincelles on 18 Aug., when the guards at the point of the bayonet drove out of a village and of an entrenched position a superior body of French who had previously captured them from the Dutch. He was engaged in the siege of Dunkirk and in the repulse of sorties, on 6 and 8 Sept., the latter at Rosendaël, but the covering army having been compelled by Houchard to retire to Furnes, the Duke of York was obliged to raise the siege, and Turner marched with the guards to Oysing, between Lille and Orchies. On 5 Oct. the British guards joined the Austrians across the Sambre for the investment of Landrecy, but the siege was not prosecuted, and Turner, repassing the Sambre with his regiment, marched to Ghent.

On 17 April 1794 Turner was engaged at Vaux in the successful attack by the allies on the French army posted between Landrecy and Guise, when it was driven behind the Oise and Landrecy invested. He was present in several affairs during the siege, and was at the action of Cateau, near Troisville, on 26 April, after which he went with the Duke of York's army to Tournay and took part in the repulse of the French attack on 11 May and subsequent actions during the same month. He accompanied the army in its retreat towards Holland in July and behind the Aa in September, took part in the fight at Bostel on 15 Sept., and in the retreat behind the Meuse to Nimègue. He greatly distinguished himself at the capture of Fort St. André, under Abercromby, on 11 Oct., and accompanied the army in the retreat behind the Waal.

Turner was promoted to be captain in the 8rd foot guards and lieutenant-colonel on 12 Nov. 1794, when he appears to have returned to England. He was promoted to be brevet colonel on 1 Jan. 1801, in which year he went with his regiment to Egypt, landing at Aboukir Bay on 8 March, when he was engaged with the enemy. He took part in the action of 18 March, and in the battle of Alexandria on 21 March. He was also in the action on the west side of Alexandria with the brigade of guards under Lord Cavan on 22 Aug., and at the capitulation of Alexandria on 2 Sept. For his services in Egypt he received the medal, and was made a knight of the order of the Crescent of Turkey by the sultan, and a knight of the order of St. Anne of Russia by the czar.

By the terms of article 6 of the capitulation of Alexandria, all the curiosities, natural and artificial, collected by the French Institute were to be delivered to the victors. The French sought to evade the article on the ground that the collections were all private property, and General Menou claimed as his own the Rosetta stone found by the French in 1798 when repairing the ruined Fort St. Julien, and deposited in his house at Alexandria. Turner, who was a great antiquary, was deputed by Lord Hutchinson to negotiate on the subject, and, after much correspondence and several conferences with General Menou, it was decided that, considerable care having been bestowed by the French in the preservation of the collection of insects and animals, these should be retained, but the antiquities and Arabian manuscripts Lord Hutchinson, 'with his usual zeal for science,' says Turner, insisted should be given up. The French were very angry, and broke the cases and removed the protecting coverings of many of the antiquarian treasures. Turner obtained a party of gunners and a 'devil' cart, with which he carried off the Rosetta stone from General Menou's house amid the jeers of the French officers and men. These gunners were the first British soldiers to enter Alexandria. Having seen the other remains of ancient Egyptian sculpture sent on board the Madras, Admiral Sir Richard Bickerton's ship, Turner embarked with the Rosetta stone, determined to share its fate, on board the Egyptienne frigate, captured in the harbour of Alexandria, and arrived at Portsmouth in February 1802. At Turner's request, Lord Buckinghamshire, secretary of state, allowed the stone to be sent first to the Society of Antiquaries, where it remained for some time before being finally (in 1802) deposited in the British Museum (Archæologia, vol. xvi.) In January 1803 Turner communicated to the Society of Antiquaries a version of the inscription on Pompey's Pillar, taken by Captain Dundas, royal engineers (see SQUIRE, JOHN; also Archæologia, vol. xv.)

In July 1803 Turner was appointed an assistant quartermaster-general to the forces in Great Britain, and on 25 June 1804 a brigadier-general on the staff at home. In April 1807 he was transferred as a brigadier-general to the staff in South America. He embarked on 24 June and returned home in the following spring. He was promoted to be major-general on 25 April 1808, and commanded a brigade in London until 1813. For some years he was deputy-secretary at Carlton House under Colonel Sir John McMahon. He was appointed colonel of the 19th foot or 1st Yorkshire North Riding regiment on 27 April 1811 on transfer from the colonelcy of the Cape regiment, which he had held for a very short period. He was promoted to be lieutenant-general on 4 June 1813. On 4 May 1814 he was made a D.C.L. of Oxford, being then in attendance on the Archduchess Catherine of Russia. On 28 July, on the conclusion of his duties in attendance on the Duchess of Oldenburg during her visit to England, he was knighted by the prince regent. On 12 June he had been appointed lieutenant-governor of Jersey and to command the troops there, and held the post until March 1816.

In 1826 Turner was appointed governor of the Bermuda Islands, and administered the government for six years. On 22 July 1830 he was promoted to be general, and on his return from the Bermudas was made a knight grand cross of the royal Hanoverian Guelphic order and appointed a groom of the bedchamber in the royal household. He died on 7 May 1843 at his residence, Gow-ray, Jersey.

Turner was the author of 'A Short Account of Ancient Chivalry and a Description of Armour,' London, 1799, 8vo; also of a translation from the French of General Warnery's 'Thoughts and Anecdotes, Military and Historical,' London, 1811, 8vo. He contributed several papers to the 'Archæologia' of the Society of Antiquaries of London, among others: 'Some Account, with a drawing, of the ruined Chapelle de Notre Dame des Pas in Jersey' (vol. xxvii.); and 'Two Views of a Cromlech near Mount Orgueil, Jersey' (vol. xxviii).

[War Office Records; Despatches; Cannon's Records of the 19th or First Yorkshires North Riding Regiment; Military Calendar, 1820; Military Annual, 1844; Gent. Mag., 1843, 1844; Annual Register, 1843; Allibon's Dictionary of English Literature.] R. II. V.

TURNER, WILLIAM (d. 1568), dean of Wells, physician and botanist, a native of Morpeth, Northumberland, and believed to have been the son of William Turner, a tanner, became a student of Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, under the patronage of Thomas, lord Wentworth (TURNER, Herbal, pt. ii. Pref.) He proceeded B.A. in 1529-30, and was elected junior fellow; became joint-treasurer of his college in 1532, commenced M.A. in 1533, had a title for orders from the college in 1537, and was senior treasurer in 1538 (COOPER). While at Cambridge he was intimate with Nicholas Ridley [q. v.] (afterwards bishop of London), who was of the same college and instructed him in Greek, was often his opponent in theological exercises, and joined him in practising archery and playing tennis (STRYPE, Memorials, III. i. 386-6). He often heard Hugh Latimer [q. v.] preach, accepted his teachings, and was one of those early professors of the gospel at Cambridge who used to meet for religious conference at a house called the White Horse, and nicknamed 'Germany' by their opponents (STRYPE, Parker, i. 12-13). Before leaving Cambridge he published his translation of 'The Comparison between the Olde Learnyng and the Newe' in 1537, a small religious book, 'Unio Dissidentium,' in 1538, and in the same year his 'Libellus de re Herbaria,' which was his first essay in a branch of science then little cultivated at Cambridge; for, writing of this work thirty years later, he says that while he was there he 'could learne neuer one Greke nether Latin nor English name euen amongst the Phisicians of any herb or tre, suchs was the ignorancie in simples at that tymes' (Herbal, pt. iii. pref.) He left Cambridge in 1540 and travelled about preaching in various places, stayed for a time at Oxford for 'the conversation of men and books,' and was afterwards imprisoned for preaching without a license (WOOD, Athena, i. 361). On his release he left England and travelled in Holland, Germany, and Italy, receiving in 1542 a benefice of 26s. 8d. from his college (COOPER); stayed some time at Bologna, studying botany under Luca Ghini, and either there or at Ferrara graduated M.D. From Italy he went to Zurich, became intimate with Conrad Gesner, the famous naturalist, who had a high opinion of his knowledge of medicine and general learning; was at Basle in 1543, and at Cologne in 1544. He collected plants in many parts of the Rhine country, and in Holland and East Frisseland, where he became physician to the 'Erle of Emden,' and made expeditions to the islands lying off the coast (JACKSON). During this time he put forth several books on religion which were popular in England, and on 8 July 1546 all persons were forbidden by proclamation to have any book written by him in English (AMES, Typogr. Antig. i. 450); he also wrote his 'Herbal,' but delayed its publication until he returned to England.

He returned on the accession of Edward VI, became chaplain and physician to the Duke of Somerset, and, it appears from a passage in his 'Spiritual Physick' (f. 44), had a seat in the House of Commons. He continued his botanical studies, had access to the duke's gardens, and had a garden of his own at Kew, where he was residing. In September 1548 he wrote to William Cecil (afterwards Lord Burghley) [q. v.], then the duke's secretary, declaring that he was destitute, and expressing his wish for some clerical preferment which would not take him far from the court (JACKSON). He received a promise of a prebend at York, and while expressing his thanks for this in another letter to Cecil of 11 June 1549, says that he hopes that he shall soon get it, for 'my childer haue bene fed so long with hops that they are verry lene, i would fayne haue them fatter' (ib.). The prebend came to him on 12 Feb. 1550 (Lib NewN, iii. 176). In July the privy council directed that he should be elected provost of Oriel College, Oxford, but an election had already been made to the office. He wrote to Cecil in September, asking for the presidentship of Magdalen College, Oxford, and he also applied for an archdeaconsry, but failed in both requests. Deeply disappointed, he wrote a despondent letter to Cecil, saying that, if he could have his health, he could get his living in Holland and many places in Germany, and asking for license to go to Germany, carrying 'ii litle horses' with him, for he was 'every day more and more vexed with the stone;' he desired to drink 'only rhenish wine' at small cost, for he believed that would relieve him; and he promised that if he was allowed to retain his 'poor prebend' while abroad, he would correct the English translation of the Bible, giving reasons for his corrections, would finish his 'great herball, and writs a book on fishes, stones, and metals' (JACKSON). In November, however, he was appointed to the deanery of Wells, vacant by the deprivation of Dean Goodman. He found some difficulty in establishing himself in his office, for when Somerset got hold of the episcopal palace he made the dean's house over to the bishop, and Goodman had therefore lived in a prebendal house, which he was not willing to resign to his successor (TYTLER, Edward VI., i. 372). Turner complained in 1551 that he had neither house nor a foot of land, and that he was in uncomfortable quarters, and could not go to his book 'for the crying of childer.' An order was issued by the crown for his installation on 24 March, and on 10 April he received a dispensation from residence without loss of emoluments while preaching the gospel within the kingdom (ib.; Wells Cathedral Manuscripts, p. 287). About this time, while acting as lecturer at Isleworth, Middlesex, he had a controversy with Robert Cooke, a man of heretical opinions, who held a subordinate office at court. In answer to Cooke, he wrote his 'Preservative or Triacle agaynst the Poyson of Pelagius' (STRYPE, Memorials, ii. i. 111; Wood, Athenæ, i. 362). On 21 Dec. 1552 he was ordained priest by Bishop Ridley (COOPER). In 1553 he was deprived of his deanery, in which Goodman was reinstated. He left England and remained abroad during Mary's reign, staying at Bonn, Strasburg, Spire, Worms, Frankfurt, Mayence, Cologne, and Weissenberg, at both which last-named places he had gardens, at Chur and at Basle. He was one of the many writers whose books were prohibited as heretical by a proclamation of the council in 1555 (FOXe, Acts and Monuments, vii. 127-8).

He returned to England on the accession of Elizabeth, and on 10 Sept. 1559 preached at St. Paul's Cross before the lord mayor and a great audience (MACHYN, p. 210). He brought a suit against Goodman for his restitution to the deanery of Wells, which was decided in his favour by a commission, and he was restored by royal order on 18 June 1560 (Wells Cathedral Manuscripts, p. 240). Moreover, he received possession of the dean's house and the prebend and rectory of Wedmore, which anciently pertained to the deanery, and had been restored to it by Mary (ib. p. 271; REYNOLDS, Wells Cathedral, Pref. p. v). Although he was neither present at the debate in convocation for altering certain rites and ceremonies of the church on 13 Feb. 1562, nor voted by proxy, he was violently opposed to all ceremonial observances, contemned episcopal authority, and was a conspicuous member of the party that endeavoured to bring the church into conformity with the reformed churches of Germany and Switzerland; indeed, one of his books that had been printed abroad and was at this time largely read in England is said to have animated the strife on these matters (STRYPE, Grindal, p. 145). He used to call the bishops 'white coats' and 'tippet gentlemen' in ridicule of their robes, and maintained that they had no more authority over him than he over them, unless it were given them 'by their holy father the pope.' The use of the square cap was particularly obnoxious to him, and he is said to have ordered an adulterer to wear one while doing his open penance, and to have so trained his dog that at a word from him it plucked off the square cap of a bishop who was dining with him (STRYPE, Parker, i. 301). His bishop, Gilbert Berkeley [q. v.], was so 'encumbered' with his unbecoming behaviour and his indiscreet language in the pulpit that in March 1564 he wrote to Cecil and to the archbishop complaining of him, and he was suspended for nonconformity.

After his suspension he appears to have resided in Crutched Friars, London, where he had a garden. He made his will on 26 Feb. 1567, and in a letter to Cecil of 13 May 1568, complaining of the delay in the receipt of his dividende from his deanery, he describes himself as old and sickly. He died at his house in Crutched Friars on 7 July following, and was buried at St. Olave's, Hart Street, where the inscription on the monument erected to him by his wife records his ability in science and theological controversy. He married Jane, daughter of George Auder, alderman of Cambridge, and by her had a son Peter, who became a physician; and two daughters: Winifred, married to John Parker (1534-1592) [q. v.], archdeacon of Ely; and Elizabeth, married to John Whitehead of Hunston, Suffolk (COOPER). His widow married Richard Cox (1500-1581) [q. v.], bishop of Ely.

Turner was a zealous botanist, learned, and of sound judgment in scientific matters. He was the first Englishman who studied plants scientifically, and his Herbal marks the start of the science of botany in England. He is said to have introduced into this country lucern, which he called horned clover (ib.) His works on theological controversies are violent and rashly written. While his wit was somewhat broad, his learning is undoubted and is warmly acknowledged by eminent men of his own time, such as Conrad Gesner, to whose museum he contributed, and in more modern days by John Ray. Nor was his vigour in controversy belied by his life; he suffered for his principles, and never, so far as is known, was false to them, for the suggestion (ib.) that he probably recanted soon after leaving Cambridge appears to be wholly without foundation.

His known works, all of which, except those otherwise noted, are in the British Museum, are, the titles being somewhat shortened: 1. 'A comparieon between the olde loarnynge and the newe,' a translation from the 'Novae Doctrinae ad Veterem Colatio' of Urbanus Rhegius, London, 8vo, 1537, 1538, 1548; reprinted in Richmond's 'Fathers of the English Church' (iv. 599 sq.). 2. 'Unio Dissidentium' [1538], dedicated to Thomas, lord Wentworth (not in Brit. Mus.), see Bale and Tanner. 3. 'Libellus de re herbaria novae,' London, 8vo, 1538; reprinted in facsimile with life of Turner by B. D. Jackson, 4to, 1877. 4. 'The huntynge and fyndynge out of the Romishe Fox . . . hyd amonge the Bysshoppes of Englande,' Baele, 8vo, 1543; published under the assumed name of 'William Wraghton,' dedicated to Henry VIII; reprinted by Robert Potts from a copy at Trinity Colloge, Cambridge, with Turner's name and different title-page, 8vo, 1851. 5. 'Historia de naturis herbarum,' Cologne, 1544, noted by Bumald, and not otherwise known. 6. 'Avium præcipuarum . . . historia ex optimis quibusque scriptoribus contexta,' Cologne, 8vo, 1544, dedicated to Henry VIII. 7. 'Dialogus de avibus et earum nominibus per Dn. Gybertum Longolium,' edited by Turner, Cologne, 1544, 8vo. 8. 'The rescuynge of the Romishe Fox . . . devised by steven gardner' at Winchester, 8vo, 1545, 'by me Hanse hit prik,' with dedication by 'William Wraghton'; a different edition, noted by Ames, 'Topographical Antiquities' (ii. 1567; noted by Bale probably as 'Contra Gardineri tochnas'). 9. Preface to 'The sum of divinitie,' by Robert Hutton or Hutten [q. v.] (sometime Turner's scholar and servant), 1548. 10. 'The names of herbes in Groke, Latin, Englishe, Duché, and Frenche . . . gathered by W. T.' London, 1548, 8vo. 11. 'A newe Dialogue . . . examination of the Messe,' London, 8vo [1548]. 12. 'A Preservative or Triacle agaynst the poyson of Pelagius,' London, 8vo [1561]. 13. 'A newe Herbal wherein are conteyned the names of Herbes,' London, fol. 1551. 14. 'The huntynge of the Romyshe Wolfe,' London, 8vo [1554?] (not in Brit. Mus.), Bodleian Library; reprinted as 'The Hunting of the Fox and the Wolfe' (AMNS, iii. 1005). 15. 'The booke of Merchants newly made by the lord Plantapole before 1555 (see FOX's Acts and Monuments, ed. Townsend, v. 567). 16. 'The Spiritual Nosegay' (see ib.) 17. 'A new Booke of Spirituall Physick for dyverse diseases of the Nobilitie and Gentlemen of Englande,' 'Rome' (Baele?), 8vo, 1555. 18. 'The seconde parts of W. T.'s Herbal . . . ' Hereunto is joined a booke of the bath of Baeth,' &c., Cologne, 8vo, 1562; the Bath book is also adjoined with additions to the 'Herbal' of 1562, and is printed in Vicary's 'Treasure for Englishmen' (4to, 1580, 1589) and later editions. 20. 'A new Boke of the natures and properties of all Wines commonely used here in England,' whereunto is annexed 21. 'The booke of "the powers . . . of the three most renowned Triacles,"' of which an inaccurate edition had already appeared, London, 8vo, 1568. 22. 'The first and seconde partes of the Herbal . . . with the thirde part: also a booke of the bath,' &c., n.s., Cologne, fol. 1568. 23. 'A catechisms,' a translation of the Heidelberg catechism with W. T.'s name, London, 8vo, 1572; without his name, 8vo, 1578. Also letters, as a long one to Conrad Gesner on English fishes in Gesner's 'Historia Animalium' (iii. 1294 sq., with date 1557; one to Bullinger in 'Zurich Letters,' 2nd ser. p. 124; and some in Jackson's 'Life' from Lansdowne manuscripts. He prepared for the press William of Newburgh's 'Historia rerum Anglicarum,' which was published by Silvius at Antwerp in 1587, but with the omission of some chapters and of Turner's preface; it was reprinted in 1587 and later (HEARNE, Hemmingi Cartularium, ii. 669). Other works, not now known to exist, are noted by Bale and Tanner, as 'Imagines stirpium,' 'De Baptismo parvulorum,' &c.

[Memoirs by Jackson, u.s., with Bibliography, Potts u.s., and in Cooper's Athenæ Cantabr. i. 255 sq.; Hodgson's Northumborland, ii. 455 sq.; Strype's Works (8vo edit.); Fox's Acts and Monuments, ed. Townsend; Brook's Paritans, i. 128; Wood's Athenæ, ed. Bliss; Wells Cath. MSS. (Hist. MSS. Comm.); Bale's Scriptt. sæc. viii. 96, p. 697; Tanner's Bibl. Brit. p. 727.]

W. II.

TURNER, WILLIAM (1653-1701), divine, son of William Turner of Marbury, Cheshire, was born there in 1653. After being taught by a private schoolmaster, he went to Broad Oak, Flint, as pupil to Philip Henry [q. v.] He matriculated from St. Edmund Hall, Oxford, on 28 March 1669, graduating B.A. 1672, M.A. 1675, and taking holy orders. In April 1680 he was appointed vicar of Walberton, Sussex, and in 1697 rector of Binstead in the same county. Turner died at Walberton, and was buried there on 6 Feb. 1700-1. By his wife Magdalen he had a son William, born on 6 June 1693.

Turner compiled an ingenious 'History of all Religions,' London, 1695, 8vo, and wrote 'An Essay on the Works of Creation,' published at the same place and date; the latter contains the 'scheme' of his principal work, the rare and curious 'Compleat History of the most Remarkable Providences, Both of Judgment and Mercy, which have Happned in this Present Age. . . . To which is added whatever is curious in the Works of Nature and Art,' London, 1697, fol. This was set on foot, Turner says, thirty years earlier by Matthew Poole [q. v.], but completed by himself. It is dedicated to John Hall, bishop of Chichester. A fine copy is in the Grenville Library at the British Museum. It is in three parts and has seven separate paginations. John Dunton [q. v.] the bookseller, who was Turner's publisher, says he was 'very generous, and would not receive a farthing for his copy till the success was assured.'

[Turner's Works; Williams's Life of Philip Henry, 1825, pp. 123, 246, 281, 441, 442, 443; Dunton's Life and Errors, 1705, p. 225; Lowndes's Bibl. Man.; Williams's Mem. of Mrs. Sarah Sawyer; Tong's Life of Matt. Henry, 1716, p.

12; Foster's Alumni Oxon. 1600-1714; information kindly supplied by the Rev. W. H. Irvine, vicar of Walberton.] C. F. S.

TURNER, WILLIAM (1651-1740), musician, born in 1651, was the son of Charles Turner, cook of Pembroke College, Oxford. At the restoration of church choirs William Turner became a choirboy under Edward Lowe [q. v.] at Christ Church, but was soon afterwards, according to Tudway, in the Chapel Royal, where he was reckoned one of the 'second set of choirboys.' He formed a close friendship with the most distinguished members of the older set, Pelham Humfrey [q. v.] and John Blow [q. v.], and shared with them in the production of the 'Club Anthem.' Tudway relates that this work was composed in one day, and performed the following day, news arriving on Saturday of a victory over the Dutch. There are chronological difficulties [see Brow, JOHN] in connection with Tudway's account. Turner's share of the anthem was the middle portion, a bass solo. After his voice had broken, he developed a fine counter-tenor, and sang for a time at Lincoln Cathedral. He was sworn a gentleman of the Chapel Royal on 11 Oct. 1669. He soon afterwards became also a vicar choral of St. Paul's and a lay vicar of Westminster Abbey.

Turner had a considerable share in the celebrations of St. Cecilia's Day, which took place nearly every year from 1683 to 1702. In 1685 he was selected to compose the ode, which that year was written by Nahum Tate. The result was probably unsatisfactory; the music was not printed (though the odes sung in 1683 and 1684, set by Purcell and Blow, had been), and is now lost, the celebration being suspended the following year. Turner appears in the list of singers at the celebration of 1687, and again in 1692 and 1695, the only celebrations at which the performers' names are preserved. In 1696 Turner graduated Mus. Doc. Cantabr.; a grand concert was given at the Commencement on 7 July. A Latin poem written on the occasion was printed on a folio sheet; it compliments Turner as inferior to Purcell alone. For St. Cecilia's day, 1697, when Dryden's 'Alexander's Feast' was the ode, Turner composed an anthem, 'The King shall rejoice,' sung at the service in St. Bride's, Fleet Street, which began the celebration. In 1698 he set the birthday ode for the Princess Anne, and announced a second performance on 4 May at the concert-room in York Buildings, 'with other variety of new vocal and instrumental musick, composed by Dr. Turner, and for his benefit' (London Gazette, 2 May 1698). On 31 Jan.

1701 Weedon gave a performance at Stationers' Hall before the houses of parliament; Turner composed two anthems for the occasion. Another anthem, 'The Queen shall rejoice,' was produced at the coronation of Queen Anne. He died at his house in King Street, Westminster, on 18 Jan. 1739-40. His wife Elizabeth, to whom he had been married nearly seventy years, had died on the 9th; and they were buried on the 16th in the same grave, in the west cloister of Westminster Abbey. By his will, dated 1728, he had bequeathed all his property to his wife, except one shilling to each of his five children. The youngest, Anne [see under ROBINSON, JOHN, 1682-1762], proved the will on 14 Feb. 1740.

Turner composed both sacred and secular music. Songs and catches were printed in several collections; and many more exist, a manuscript in the Fitzwilliam Museum containing more than a hundred. British Museum Addit. MS. 10759, dated 1681, contains unharmonised tunes for Thomas Flatman's elegy on the Earl of Rochester, and four other poems. His sacred music is more remarkable. One piece was printed in John Playford's 'Harmonia Sacra,' 1688. Two complete services and six anthems (including 'The King shall rejoice' and 'The Queen shall rejoice') are in Tudway's scores; eight more anthems are preserved at Ely Cathedral, and others at Westminster Abbey and the Chapel Royal. One of Turner's anthems, 'Lord, Thou hast been our Refuge,' is printed in Boyce's 'Cathedral Music'; and another, 'Lift up your heads,' in Warren's 'Chorister's Handbook' and in the 'Parish Choir,' vol. iii. Chants by Turner are in the 'Parish Choir,' vol. i. and Rimbauld's 'Cathedral Chants.'

A theoretical treatise, 'Sound Anatomised,' followed by an essay on 'The Great Abuse of Musick,' 1721, was by William Turner, who is not styled Mus. Doc. Its author was probably a William Turner who published some sonatas about that period; but it has been sometimes ascribed to Dr. Turner, and is singularly antiquated in several respects, even arguing against key-signatures as unnecessary. The younger William Turner also composed songs for several plays, which are inaccurately described as operas in Brown and Stratton's 'British Musical Biography' and ascribed to Dr. Turner.

[Cheque-book of the Chapel Royal, in Camden Society's publications, 1872; Gent. Mag. 1740, p. 36; Chester's Westminster Abbey Registers, p. 353; Graduali Cantabrigienses, p. 480; Tudway's scores and profices, Harleian MSS. 7337-42; Hawkins's Hist. of Music, chaps. 168, 167; Burney's Hist. of Music, iii. 460; Husk's Musical Celebrations on St. Cecilia's Day, pp. 21, 23, 26, 36, 39, 147; Grove's Dict. of Music and Musicians, iv. 194; manuscripts quoted.] H. D.

TURNER, WILLIAM (1714-1794), dissenting divine, son of John Turner (1689-1737), was born at Preston, Lancashire, on 5 Dec. 1714. His father, a restless man, who was minister for short periods at Preston, Rivington, Northwich, Wirksworth, and Knutsford, distinguished himself on the Hanoverian side in the rebellion of 1716. His mother was Hannah (d. 20 Feb. 1747), daughter of William Chorley of Preston; her first husband's name was Holder. Turner was educated at Findern Academy (1732-6) under Ebenezer Latham, and at Glasgow University (1736-7). He was dissenting minister at Allostock, Cheshire (1737-48), but was not ordained till 7 Aug. 1739. Ill-health caused him to retire from the ministry for eight years, during which he kept a school; in 1754 he became minister at Congleton, Cheshire; in April 1761 he removed to Wakefield, where he continued to minister till July 1792.

His Wakefield ministry brought him into close connection with Thomas Amory (1691?-1788) [q. v.], the creator of 'John Bunce,' with Joseph Priestley [q. v.], then at Leeds, whose opinions he espoused; and with Theophilus Lindsey [q. v.], then vicar of Catterick, whose policy of inviting a unitarian secession from the established church he disapproved. His manuscript criticisms suggested to Priestley the project of his 'Theological Repository,' to which Turner contributed (1768-71) with the signature of 'Vigilius' (Wakefield). His notes in Priestley's 'Harmony of the Evangelists,' 1780, are signed 'T.' He died on 28 Aug. 1794. He married (1758) Mary (d. 31 Oct. 1784), eldest daughter of John Holland of Moberley, Cheshire, by whom he had two sons. He published several single sermons.

WILLIAM TURNER, soundns (1761-1869), oldest son of the above, was born at Wakefield on 20 Sept. 1761. He was educated at Warrington Academy (1777-81) and Glasgow University (1781-2). On 25 Sept. 1782 he was ordained pastor of the Hanover Square congregation, Newcastle-on-Tyne. He ministered at Newcastle for fifty-nine years, retiring on 20 Sept. 1841. He was a main founder (1793) of the Literary and Philosophical Society at Newcastle, and acted as secretary till 1833; he was also a founder of the Natural Historical Society (1824). He was a chief projector of the Newcastle branch of the Bible Society, and one of its secretaries till 1831. Every benevolent and scientific interest in the town owed much to him. From 1808 till his death he was visitor of Manchester College (then at York, now at Oxford), and till 1840 he invariably delivered the visitor's annual address. Among the subscribers to a volume of his sermons published in 1838 appeared the names of two bishops, who by their action incurred some censure [see MALTRAX, EDWARD]. He died at Lloyd Street, Greenheys, Manchester, on 24 April 1859, and was buried on 28 April in the graveyard of Upper Brook Street chapel. He married, first, in 1784, Mary (d. 16 Jan. 1797), daughter of Thomas Holland of Manchester; secondly, on 8 June 1799, Jane (d. 1855), eldest daughter of William Willets, minister at Newcastle-under-Lyme. He survived all but one of his children. A long list of his publications is given in the 'Christian Reformer,' 1859, p. 459. This does not include his contributions to periodicals, usually signed V. F. [i.e. Vigiliū Filius]; with this signature he contributed to the 'Monthly Repository,' 1810 and 1811, a valuable series of historical and biographical articles relating to Warrington Academy. His portrait, by Morton, and his bust, by Bailey, are in the rooms of the Literary and Philosophical Society of Newcastle.

WILLIAM TURNER, tertius (1788-1853), son of the preceding, was born at Newcastle on 13 Jan. 1788. He was educated at Glasgow University, where he graduated M.A. in 1806, at Manchester College (then at York), and at Edinburgh University (1803). From 1809 to 1827 he was tutor at Manchester College in mathematics and philosophy. In February 1829 he became minister of Northgate End chapel, Ilkley, where he exerted great influence as a promoter of educational and scientific culture. He died on 30 Dec. 1853. He married (1817) Miss Benton, niece of Newcome Cappe [q. v.] He published several sermons and tracts; his contributions to periodicals are sometimes signed V. N. [i.e. Vigiliū Nepos]. His most important work is 'Lives of Eminent Unitarians,' 1840-43, 2 vols. 12mo.

[Wood's Funeral Sermon for William Turner, with Memoirs by William Turner (secundus), 1794; Harris's Funeral Sermon for William Turner (secundus), 1859; Memoir of William Turner (secundus) in the Christian Reformer, 1859, pp. 361 sq.; Memoir of William Turner (tertius), in the Christian Reformer, 1854, pp. 129 sq.; Spears's Record of Unitarian Worthies, 1878; Addison's Roll of Glasgow Graduates, 1898; information from the Rev. R. T. Harford.]

A. G.

TURNER, WILLIAM (1789-1862), commonly called 'Turner of Oxford,' was born at Blackbourton, Oxfordshire, on 12 Nov. 1789. His parents died when he was very young, and he was brought up by an uncle, then of Burton, who in 1804 purchased the estate and manor-house of Shipton-on-Cherwell, near Woodstock. His uncle, observing his love of drawing, apprenticed him to John Varley [q. v.], of whom he was one of the earliest pupils. In January 1808 he joined the 'Old Watercolour' Society as associate, and became a full member in November. He also joined the Sketching Society, founded by the Chaloners in that year. He settled at Oxford about 1811, where he spent the greater part of his life, chiefly employed in teaching. He sent drawings to the society's exhibitions every year till his death, contributing 455 works in all. He also exhibited at the Royal Academy, the British Institution, and Suffolk Street. He sometimes painted in oils. His subjects were taken from Oxford and its neighbourhood, and from various other places in England, Scotland, and Wales. He preferred wide prospects under broad atmospheric effects, which he treated with considerable skill, introducing sheep and cattle with good effect. He was a devoted student of nature, and had a distinct style of his own, marked by truth and simplicity rather than elegance and imagination. He died on 7 Aug. 1862 at 16 St. John's Street, Oxford, and was buried at Shipton-on-Cherwell. In 1824 he married Elizabeth Hott at Shipton, but had no family. A loan exhibition of his works was held in the University Galleries, Oxford, in 1895.

[Redgrave's Dict.; Rogge's 'Old Watercolour' Society; Ruskin's Modern Painters; Catalogue of Loan Exhibition at Oxford, 1895, with preface by the master of Trinity.] C. M.

TURNER, WILLIAM (1792-1897), diplomatist and author, born at Yarmouth on 6 Sept. 1792, was the son of Richard Turner (1751-1835), lecturer, and afterwards perpetual curate of Great Yarmouth, by his second wife, Elizabeth (1761-1806), eldest daughter of Thomas Rede of Beccles. Sir George James Turner [q. v.] was his younger brother. The father, Richard Turner, was a friend of George Canning, who gave William a post in the foreign office. In 1811 he was attached to the embassy of Robert Liston, and accompanied him to Constantinople [see LISTON, SIR ROBERT]. He remained in the east for five years, and during that time visited most parts of the Ottoman dominions, as well as the islands and mainland of Greece. While in Asia Minor he endeavoured to emulate Leander and Lord Byron by swimming the Hellespont, and, failing in the attempt, palliated his ill-success by pointing out that he tried to swim from Asia to Europe, a far more difficult feat than Lord Byron's passage from Europe to Asia. Byron replied in a letter to Murray published at the time, and Turner, in a counter rejoinder, overwhelmed his adversary with quotations from ancient and modern topographers (Moon, Life of Byron, 1846, pp. 497, 663). He published the results of his wanderings in 1820 under the title 'Journal of a Tour in the Levant,' London, 8vo. His diary contains many sketches of eastern customs. He is somewhat discursive, dealing rather with local manners and customs than with the political or military institutions of Turkey.

In 1824 he returned to Constantinople as secretary to the English embassy. During the absence of an ambassador, due to the removal of Lord Strangford to St. Petersburg, Turner filled the office of minister plenipotentiary. On 22 Oct. 1829 he was appointed envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the republic of Columbia, and after filling that post for nine years he retired from the service. He died at Loanington on 10 Jan. 1867, and was buried in the vault of the parish church of Birstall in Leicestershire. A brass was erected in his memory on the north wall of the chancel. On 10 April 1824, at St. George's, Hanover Square, he married Mary Anne (1797-1891), daughter and coheir of John Mansfield of Birstall. By her he had one surviving son—Mansfield—and a daughter, Mary Anne Elizabeth (1825-1894), who married Walter Stewart Broadwood.

[Harvard Turner's Turner Family; Burke's Family Records.] E. I. O.

TURNERELLI, PETER (1774-1839), sculptor, born at Belfast in 1774, was the grandson of an Italian political refugee named Tognarelli, and his father (who changed the name to Turnerelli) practised as a modeller in Dublin and married an Irishwoman. Peter was educated in Dublin for the church, but at the age of seventeen, on removing to London with his family, became a pupil of Peter Francis Chenu, the sculptor, and a student at the Royal Academy, where he gained a medal. In 1797 he was appointed, on the recommendation of Benjamin West, to instruct the princesses in modelling, and he resided at court for three years, during which time he executed busts of all the members of the royal family. At the conclusion of his engagement, in 1801, he was appointed sculptor in ordinary to the royal family, but declined an offer of knighthood. He was subsequently employed in a similar capacity by the Princess of Wales. In 1802 Turnerelli exhibited at the Royal Academy a bust of the youthful Princess Charlotte, and thenceforward enjoyed a fashionable and lucrative practice, chiefly as a modeller of busts. Among his many distinguished sitters were the Dukes of Wellington, Prince Blucher, Count Platoff, Lord Melville, Erskine, Pitt, and Grattan. In 1809 he sculptured the 'jubilee' bust of George III, now at Windsor, of which eighty copies were ordered by various noblemen and public bodies; also the companion bust of the queen, and in the following year a statue of the king in his state robes. When the czar of Russia was in London in 1814 he visited Turnerelli's studio and ordered replicas of his busts of Blucher and Platoff for the Hermitage Gallery. In 1816 he was commissioned to execute the 'nuptial' busts of Princess Charlotte and Prince Leopold, and the former gave him a sitting at his studio on the morning of the wedding. Among his later works were a medallion of Princess Victoria at the age of two, and busts of Lord Aberdeen, Lord Palmerston, and Daniel O'Connell; the last was extremely popular, and ten thousand plaster copies of it are said to have been disposed of in Ireland. Turnerelli did some good monumental work, and when in 1814 a committee was formed to erect a memorial to Burns at Dumfries his design—a figure of the poet at the plough—was selected and carried out. Other good examples of his ability are the monument to Colonel Stuart in Canterbury Cathedral, and that to Sir John Hope in Westminster Abbey. At the accession of George IV he was again offered and again declined knighthood. He was appointed sculptor to the kings of France, Russia, and Portugal.

Turnerelli was a constant exhibitor at the academy from 1802 until his death, which occurred, after a few hours' illness, at his house in Newman Street, London, on 20 March 1839. He was buried in the graveyard of St. John's Chapel, St. John's Wood. Though throughout his career he earned a large income, he saved little and died intestate. His effects were therefore sold by auction and most of his models and moulds purchased by Manzoni, who reproduced them in large numbers. Turnerelli, at the suggestion of West, introduced the practice of representing sitters in their own dress, instead of the conventional classic drapery. His busts of Wellington and Melville were well engraved in mezzotint by Charles Turner and John Young respectively; engravings of his monument to Burns and his medallion of Princess Victoria were published in the 'European Magazine,' vols. lxx. and lxxx. He married, first, Margaret Tracy, who was a claimant to the Tracy peerage, and died in 1885; secondly, a relative of the Earl of Clare. By his first wife he had a son, who is noticed below. A portrait of Turnerelli, painted by S. Drummond, was engraved by J. Thomson for the 'European Magazine,' 1821.

EDWARD TRACY TURNERELLI (1813-1896), son of Peter Turnerelli, was born in Newman Street, London, on 13 Oct. 1813. For a time he studied modelling under his father and at the Royal Academy, but in 1838 went to Russia, where he spent eighteen years, visiting, under the emperor's patronage, the most distant parts of that country and sketching its ancient monuments. He returned to England in 1854, and, obtaining an independent income by his marriage with Miss Martha Hankey, devoted the remainder of his life to politics as an ardent supporter of conservative principles. In 1878 he earned notoriety as the projector of a scheme for presenting a 'people's tribute'—in the form of a gold laurel wreath—to the Earl of Beaconsfield in recognition of his services at the Berlin congress, but the earl declined to accept the gift, and the wreath was left on Turnerelli's hands. Turnerelli died at Leamington on 24 Jan. 1896. He wrote: 1. 'Tales of the Rhenish Chivalry,' 1835. 2. 'Kazau, the Ancient Capital of the Tatar Khans,' 1854. 3. 'What I know of the late Emperor Nicholas,' 1855. 4. 'A Night in a Haunted House,' 1859, and many political pamphlets. In 1884 he published his 'Memories of a Life of Toil, or the Autobiography of the Old Conservative.'

[European Mag. 1821, i. 387-93; Gent. Mag. 1830, i. 548; Autobiography of Tracy Turnerelli; Times, 25 Jan. 1896; Exhibition Catalogues; Jordan's Autobiogr. p. 118.] F. M. O'D.

TURNHAM, ROBERT DE (d. 1211), baron, was younger son of Robert de Turnham, founder of Combwell Priory, Kent, and brother of Stephen de Turnham [q. v.] Like his brother, he took part in the third crusade, and in May 1191 was in command of one half of Richard's fleet which sailed round Cyprus to capture hostile galleys (Roe. Hov. iii. 109). When Richard left for Acre, Robert de Turnham remained in Cyprus as co-justiciar with Richard de Camville. Camville died soon after, and Turnham, becoming sole justiciar, quelled a revolt of the natives (ib. iii. 111, 116). In April 1198 he returned to England 'cum hernasio regis' (ib. iii. 206; Chron. de Melis, i. 260). Richard rewarded Turnham for his services with the hand of Johanna, daughter and heiress of William Fossard, the last of the old lords of Mulgres (ib. i. 106, 231). This seems to have been about 1196, and in 1197 Turnham was in command of Richard's forces in Anjou (ib. i. 290). At Richard's death Turnham, as seneschal of Anjou, surrendered the castles of Chinon and Saumur, together with the royal treasure, to John, and at once became a faithful adherent of the new king (Roe. Hov. iv. 86). He was with John in France in June 1200 (Rot. Normannie, pp. 24, 26), and was present at Lincoln when the king of Scots did homage on 22 Nov. of that year (Roe. Hov. iv. 142). In 1201 John sent him to suppress the revolt in Poitou (ib. iv. 176), and for the next four years Turnham remained abroad as the king's seneschal in Poitou and Gascony (Cal. Rot. Pat., Record ed. pp. 1, 82, 49). Turnham's efforts could not prevent the conquest of Poitou by Philip Augustus, and at last, towards the end of 1204 or beginning of 1205, he was taken prisoner (ib. p. 49). He recovered his liberty about the end of the latter year, and in January 1206 was with the king in England (ib. p. 58). In 1208 and 1209 he was again serving in Gascony (ib. pp. 77, 79, 91). Matthew Paris describes Robert de Turnham as one of John's evil counsellors ii. 531). Turnham died in 1211 (ib. ii. 532), leaving by his wife Johanna an only daughter and heiress, Isabella, who was born after 1200, and subsequently to the death of her parents given in marriage to Peter de Mauley [q. v.], by whom she became the ancestress of the later barons De Mauley, lords of Mulgres (Chron. de Melis, i. 106, 291).

[Roger Hoveden's Chronicle, and Chronicon de Melis, ap. Rolls Ser.; Norgate's England under the Angevin Kings; English Historical Review, xi. 516.] G. L. K.

TURNHAM, STEPHEN DE (d. 1215), justice, has been commonly identified with Stephen de Tours or de Marzai; but the identification, which was questioned by Mr. Eyton (Itinerary of Henry II, p. 297), seems untenable.

Stephen de Tours or de Marzai (d. 1198) is mentioned in the pipe roll for Norfolk in 1158 (ib. p. 37), and was one of the royal chamberlains in 1161 (ib.) There are references to him as 'Stephen de Turon' in the pipe rolls from 1159 to 1172. He was seneschal of Anjou in September 1180 (ib. p. 285), and still held that post on 12 June 1189, when he fired Le Mans to defend it from Philip Augustus (Roe. Nov. ii. 363). Richard I, on his accession, imprisoned Stephen de Marzai and compelled him to surrender the royal treasure of which he had charge (ib. iii. 8). Richard of Devizes (pp. 6-7, Engl. Hist. Soc.), who calls him Stephen de Marzai, says that he was imprisoned at Winchester, and had to pay a heavy fine for his release. William of Newburgh relates that he had been raised from a humble position by Henry II, and was after his release continued in authority by Richard I. Stephen, believing that Richard would never return, and relying on the fallacious prophecy of a wizard, exercised his power in an arbitrary fashion. The wizard foretold that he would die 'in pluma,' and Stephen met his death at a fortress of that name shortly before Richard's return in 1193 (Chron. Stephen, Henry II, and Richard I, ii. 424-6). He is styled Stephen de Turonis by Hoveden and in official documents, Stephen Tironensis or de Turonis in the 'Gesta Henrici' (BENEDICT ABBAS, ii. 67, 71).

Stephen de Turnham was elder son of Robert de Turnham, a knight of Kent, who founded Combwell Priory in the reign of Henry II (Ilaster, Hist. Kent, ii. 494, iv. 236). Robert de Turnham [q. v.] was his younger brother. He is first mentioned on 11 Feb. 1188 as witness to a charter at Geddington, and in July 1189, like Stephen de Turonis, was at Chinon (Itinerary, pp. 285, 207; of Epistole Cantuarienses, p. 166). He went on the third crusade, and while at Palestine once caught Balian of Ibelin and Reginald of Sidon coming from an interview with Saladin (Itinerarium Regis Ricardi, pp. 299, 337). In 1198 he escorted Berengaria and Joan of Sicily to Rome on their way back from Palestine (Roe. Nov. iii. 228). In the last two years of Richard's reign he occurs as one of the justices before whom fines were levied, and as a justice itinerant in the counties of Essex, Hertford, and Surrey. He continued to act in the same capacity during the first four years of the next reign (Madox, Hist. Exch. i. 565, 733-7, 743; Feet of Fines, 7-8 Richard I, 195, Pipe Rolls Soc.) From 1197 to 1199 he had custody of the archbishop of York, was sheriff of Wiltshire in 1199, and on 22 Nov. 1200 was one of the witnesses to the homage of the king of Scots at Lincoln (Roe. Nov. iv. 92, 142). In 1204 he was discharged from all accounts by a fine of one thousand marks (Cal. Rot. Pat. p. 41). But he continued to enjoy John's favour, and had charge of Eleanor of Brittany in 1204. There are various notices of Stephen de Turnham in the royal service down to 1213, when he appears to have had charge of the king's son Henry (Cal. Rot. Claus. i. 121, 123).

He married Edeline, daughter and heiress of Ranulph de Broc. One of the estates he acquired with her he held by the service of 'Ostarius Camere Regis.' He died in 1215, leaving by his wife four daughters. He confirmed and increased his father's benefaction to Combwell Priory (Dugdale, Monast. Angl. vi. 413).

[Authorities cited; Foss's Judges of England.]
C. L. K.

TURNOR, SIR CHRISTOPHER (1607-1675), judge, born on 6 Dec. 1607, was eldest son of Christopher Turnor of Milton Erneys or Ernest, Bedfordshire (a scion of the old family of Turnor of Haverhill, Suffolk, and Parndon, Essex), by Ellen, daughter of Thomas Samm of Pirton, Hertfordshire. He graduated B.A. in 1630 from Emmanuel College, Cambridge, proceeded M.A. in 1633, and subsequently gave a donation towards the rebuilding of the college chapel, begun in 1638. In November 1633 he was called to the bar at the Middle Temple, where he was elected a bencher in 1651. On 7 March 1638-9 he was appointed jointly with William Watkins receiver-general of South Wales. During the civil war he adhered to the king, and on the Restoration he was made serjeant-at-law, third baron of the exchequer, knighted (4, 7, 16 July 1660), and placed on the commission for the trial of the regicides (October). At the Gloucester autumn assizes in 1661 he displayed a degree of circumspection unusual in that age. One William Harrison was missing under suspicious circumstances, and John Porry swore that his mother Joan and his brother, Richard Perry, had murdered him. The grand jury found a true bill, but Turnor refused to try the case until Harrison's body should be produced. Sir Robert Hyde, before whom the same case came at the next Lent assizes, was less cautious. He allowed the case to proceed, the jury convicted the prisoners, and they were executed; but some years afterwards their innocence was established by Harrison's reappearance. Turnor surrendered the receivership of South Wales on 16 June 1662. At York in the winter of 1663-4 he opened the commission under which several puritans implicated in the northern plot suffered death (Kelley, Report of Divers Cases in the Pleas of the Crown in the Reign of Charles II, p. 19; Drake, York, p. 175). In the administration of the Conventicle and Five Mile acts he appears to have shown as much lenity towards the accused as the rigour of these statutes permitted. He was a member of the special court of summary jurisdiction created to adjudicate on disputes between owners and occupiers of property in the districts ravaged by the fire of London (stat. 19 and 20 Car. II, s. 14). In recognition of the services which in this capacity he rendered to the public, his portrait, painted for the corporation of London by Michael Wright in 1671, was placed in Guildhall. There is also an engraved portrait of him at Lincoln's Inn. Another portrait, by Sir Peter Lely, is at Stoke-Rochford House. He died in May 1675, and was buried on the 19th in the church at Milton Erneys.

By his wife Joyce (d. 1707), sister of Sir Philip Warwick [q. v.], he left issue a son Edmund (d. 1679), father of a son of the same name who died in 1764 without issue; also a daughter Joyce, who married, 18 Dec. 1687, James Master of Gray's Inn and East Langdon, Kent, and was maternal grandmother of Sir George Pocock [q. v.] and mother-in-law of George Byng, viscount Torrington [q. v.]

The estate of Milton Erneys passed eventually by purchase to the judge's youngest brother, Sir Edmund Turnor (knighted 1663, died 1707) of Stoke-Rochford, Lincolnshire, ancestor of Edmund Turnor [q. v.]

[Le Neve's Pedigrees of Knights (Harl. Soc.), pp. 94, 180; Burko's Commoners, i. 300; Visitation of Bedfordshire (Harl. Soc.), p. 147; Addit. MSS. 5524 f. 9, 19103 f. 339; Blomfield's Collect. Cantabrig. p. 117; Dr. Coe's Correspondence (Surtees Soc.) p. 107; Gent. Mag. 1782 p. 69, 1790 ii. 781; Siderfin's Reports, p. 3; Wynne's Sergeant-at-Law, p. 296; Cal. State Papers, Dom. 1638-70 passim; Cobbett's State Trials, v. 986; Howell's State Trials, xiv. 1318; Hist. MSS. Comm. 8th Rep. App. i. 4, 212; Misc. Gen. et Herald. now ser. ii. 160, Lysons's Magna Britannia, i. 118; Environs of London, iv. 348; Marr. Lic. Fac. Off. Cant. (Harl. Soc.), p. 101; Turnor's Collections for the Town and Soke of Grantham, p. 147; Nichols's Illustr. Lit. vi. 592; Harvey's Account of the Great Fire in London in 1666; Foss's Lives of the Judges; Brief Memoirs of the Judges whose portraits are preserved in Guildhall (1791); Foss's Descr. Acc. of the Guildhall of the City of London; Cat. of Sculpture, &c., at Guildhall.]
J. M. R.

TURNOR, EDMUND (1755?-1829), antiquary, born in 1755 or 1756, was the eldest son of Edmund Turnor (d. 1805) of Stoke-Rochford and Panton in Lincolnshire, by his wife Mary only daughter of John Disney of Lincoln. He was descended from Sir Edmund Turnor, brother of Sir Christopher Turnor [q. v.] He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, as a fellow commoner, graduating B.A. in 1777 and M.A. in 1781. On leaving the university he took a tour through France, Switzerland, and Italy. He early acquired a taste for antiquities, and in 1778 was elected a fellow of the Society of Antiquaries. In the following year he printed 'Chronological Tables of the High Sheriffs of the County of Lincoln and of the Knights of the Shire, Citizens, and Burgesses, within the same' (London, 4to), and soon after he furnished several contributions towards the account of Lincolnshire in Gough's 'Magna Britannia.' On 15 June 1786 Turnor was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, and on 24 Dec. 1802 he was returned to parliament for Midhurst in Sussex, and retained his seat till the dissolution of 1806. He died at Stoke Park, near Grantham, on 19 March 1829, and was buried in the family vault at Stoke Rochford. He was twice married: first, to Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Philip Broke of Nacton in Suffolk. She died on 21 June 1801, leaving one daughter, Elizabeth Edmunds, who married Frederick Manning. Turnor married, secondly, Dorothea, third daughter of Lieutenant-colonel Tucker, by whom he had seven surviving children: five sons—Christopher, Cecil, Algernon, Henry Martin, and Philip Broke—and two daughters, Charlotte and Harriet.

Besides the works mentioned Turnor was the author of: 1. 'London's Gratitude; or an Account of such pieces of Sculpture and Painting as have been placed in Guildhall at the expense of the City of London. To which is added a list of persons to whom the Freedom of the City has been presented since 1758,' London, 1783, 8vo. 2. 'Description of an Ancient Castle at Rouen in Normandy,' London, 1785, 4to; also printed in 'Archæologia,' vii. 232-5. 3. 'A Description of the Diet of King Charles when Duke of York,' London, 1803, 4to. 4. 'Collections for the History of the Town and Soke of Grantham, containing Authentic Memoirs of Sir Isaac Newton, from Lord Portsmouth's Manuscripts,' London, 1806, 4to. 5. 'Remarks on the Military History of Bristol,' Bristol, 1823, 4to; also printed in the 'Archæologia,' xiv. 119-31. He edited from Clarendon 'Characters of Eminent Men in the Reigns of Charles I and II,' London, 1793, 4to. He contributed 'Extracts from the Household Book of Thomas Cony of Basingthorpe, co. Lincoln,' to Archæologia, xi. 22-33, and 'A Narrative of the Earthquake felt in Lincolnshire on 25 Feb. 1792' to the 'Philosophical Magazine,' 402.

sophical Transactions,' lxxxii. 288-8, and wrote for the 'Biographia Britannica' the memoir of Sir Richard Fanshawe.

[Gent. Mag. 1829, i. 566; Nichols's Lit. Illustr. vi. 592-602.] E. I. C.

TURNOR, SIR EDWARD (1617-1676), judge, born in Threadneedle Street, London, in 1617, was the eldest son of Arthur Turnor (d. 1651) of Parndon Parva, Essex, and the Middle Temple, serjeant-at-law, by Anne, daughter of John Jermy of Gunton, Norfolk. Educated at Abingdon, under Dr. Thomas Godwin [q. v.], and at Queen's College, Oxford, where he matriculated on 9 Nov. 1632, but did not graduate, Turnor was called to the bar in 1640 at the Middle Temple, of which he was elected treasurer in 1662. On 28 Dec. 1658 he was returned to parliament for Essex, which county he seems also to have represented in the parliaments of 1654 and 1656, and which he continued to represent on the Restoration. He was then made king's counsel and attorney-general to the Duke of York (15 June 1660), knighted (7 July), and employed in the prosecution of the regicides (October), and of certain obscure fanatics charged in December 1663 with imagining the king's death. In the parliament which met on 8 May 1661 he represented Hertford, and was chosen speaker of the House of Commons. During his tenure of this office, which lasted until his elevation to the bench, he distinguished himself chiefly by the courtly style of his addresses to the throne.

His loyalty did not go unrewarded. In December 1663 a treasury warrant was signed for the payment to him of 2,000*l.* as a free gift; a similar warrant for 5,000*l.* was signed in July 1664; and yet another for 4,000*l.* on 26 Sept. 1671. On 18 Feb. 1667-8 he took exception to Sir Richard Temple's bill for the frequent holding of parliaments on the ground that it was blotched and interlined.

On 11 May 1670 Turnor became solicitor-general after the death of Sir Geoffrey Palmer [q. v.], the attorney-general. He was made serjeant-at-law and lord chief baron of the exchequer (23 May 1671). On the re-assembling of parliament (4 Feb. 1672-3) he was succeeded as speaker by Sir Job Charlton [q. v.]. According to Roger North (Lives, i. 52), his removal to the court of exchequer was occasioned by the clamour raised by the commons on his detection in the receipt of a trifling gratuity from the East India Company; and it is possible that some corrupt transactions in which he had been concerned came to light in the course of the parliamentary investigation into the charges brought by Thomas Skinner against the company in 1669. The minutes of these proceedings were expunged from the journals on the adjustment (22 Feb. 1669-70) of the dispute between the two houses to which they gave rise, and the defect is only partially supplied by Hatsell's 'Precedents' (1818, iii. 368-92), Grey's 'Debates' (i. 150), and Cobbett's 'Parliamentary History' (iv. 422) and 'State Trials' (vi. 710-70).

Turnor was a younger brother of Trinity House (admitted October 1663) and steward of the royal forest of Waltham. As chief baron he became ex officio a member of the court of summary jurisdiction established to try causes between owners and occupiers of estates in the districts ravaged by the fire of London. In recognition of his services in this capacity the corporation of London caused his portrait to be painted by Michael Wright, and placed in the Guildhall (1671) [cf. TURNOR, SIR CHRISTOPHER]. He died on circuit at Bedford on 4 March 1675-6. His remains were interred in the parish church of Parndon Parva, where he had his principal seat. He was also lord of the neighbouring manor of Great Hallingbury. Turnor's official utterances while speaker were printed by his order, and are collected in Grey's 'Debates' and Cobbett's 'Parliamentary History.' A favourable impression of his eloquence is afforded by his speech at the prorogation of parliament, 8 Feb. 1667-8.

Turnor married twice: (1) Sarah (d. 1651), daughter of Gerard Gore, alderman of London, through whom he acquired the estates of Shillinglee Park, Kirdford, Sussex, and Down Place, near Godalming, Surrey; (2) (before 1656) Mary, daughter of Henry Ewor of South Mimms, Middlesex, widow of William Ashton of Tingrith, Bedfordshire. By his second wife, who survived him, he had no issue. By his first wife he left issue, with a daughter, two sons, of whom the younger, Arthur Turnor, resided at Shillinglee Park, married Elizabeth, daughter of John Urling of Eton, Stoke-Potter, Buckinghamshire, and had issue a son Edward, who died without issue in 1796.

The chief baron's elder son, SIR EDWARD TURNOR (1648-1721), was appointed gentleman of the privy chamber in 1680, and represented Orford, Suffolk, in parliament throughout the reign of Queen Anne. He married, in May 1687, Lady Isabella, daughter of William Keith, seventh earl marischal [q. v.], and, dying on 3 Dec. 1721, left issue, with a daughter Sarah, a son Charles, who died without male issue. The daughter, Sarah Turnor, married Francis Gee, and left issue a daughter Sarah, who succeeded as sole heiress to the Turnor estates, which, by her marriage with Joseph Garth, passed on her death, 22 Sept. 1744, to her son, Edward Turnour Garth, who assumed the additional name of Turnour, and was created Baron Winterton of Gort, Galway, on 10 April 1761, and Viscount Turnour and Earl of Winterton on 12 Feb. 1766.

[Le Neve's Pedigrees of Knights (Harl. Soc.), p. 87; Addit. MS. 19103 f. 339; Morant's Essex, ii. 495-6, 513; Manning and Bray's Surrey, ii. 7; Lodge's Peerage of Ireland, 'Turnour, Earl Winterton'; The Genealogist, ed. Selby, iii. 248, Dugdale's Orig. p. 222; Willis's Not. Parl. ii. 261, 274; Lists of Members of Parliament (official); Lords' Journ. xiv. 344; Commons' Journ. viii. 245, ix. 126, 246; Parl. Hist. iv. 200, 411, Cobbett's State Trials, v. 1075, 1103, vi. 226; Pepys's Diary, ed. Braybrooke; Wood's Athenæ Oxon. (Bliss) iii. 1060; Bigland's Observations on Parochial Registers, p. 28; Cal. State Papers, Dom. 1665-71 passim; Hist. MSS. Comm. 2nd Rep. App. p. 79, 7th Rep. pp. 136, 152, 474, 12th Rep. App. vii. 48, 51, 68; Harvey's Account of the Great Fire in London in 1666; Price's Deser. Acc. of the Guildhall of the City of London, p. 79; Carlisle's Gentlemen of the Privy Chamber, p. 194; Memoire of Lady Fanshawe, 1830; Turnor's Hertford, p. 124; Allen's Lincolnshire, v. 317; Horsfield's Sussex, ii. 183; Berry's County Genealogies (Sussex), p. 368; Foss's Lives of the Judges; Manning's Speakers of the House of Commons; Burke's Peerage, &c. 'Winterton.' J. M. R.]

TURNOUR, CYRIL (1575?-1626), dramatist. [See TOURNEUR.]

TURNOUR, GEORGE (1799-1843), orientalist, was the eldest son of George Turnour, third son of Edward Turnour Garth Turnour, first earl of Winterton [see under TURNOR, SIR EDWARD]. His mother was Emilie, niece to the Cardinal Duc de Beausset. He was born in 1799 in Ceylon, where his father was employed in the public service, but was educated in England. In 1818 he entered the Ceylon civil service, and devoted himself to the study not only of the vernaculars of the island, but also to the unexplored literature of Pali, the leading religious language of Ceylon and other Buddhist lands. In 1826, when residing at Ratnapura, near Adam's Peak, he obtained from his instructor in Pali a copy of the 'Mahāvamsa,' the most important authority on the ancient history of Ceylon. His first publication on this subject was in the 'Ceylon Almanack' in 1833. He had previously given a copy of his researches to Major Forbes, who republished them in his

'Eleven Years in Ceylon' (London, 1840), with confirmations of their accuracy. The great discovery of Turnour's life was the identification of King Piyadassi, the promulgator of the celebrated rock-edicts scattered over India, with Asoka, the grandson of Chandragupta, the Sandrakottus of Greek history. This turning-point of Indian historical research was communicated to James Prinsep and published by him, with a supplementary paper by Turnour himself, in the 'Journal of the Bengal Asiatic Society' for 1837. In literature Turnour's magnum opus was his edition of the 'Mahāvamsa' (vol. i.), published in 1836, with an English translation and a masterly historical introduction. This was the first Pali text of any extent that had at that time been printed. His literary work was carried on without detriment to public duty, and in the latter part of his career he was a member of the supreme council of Ceylon. His health becoming impaired in 1841, he returned to Europe, and died at Naples on 10 April 1843.

[Tennant's Ceylon, 3rd ed. i. 312 (from orig. documents); obituary in Journal of Royal As. Soc. vol. viii. (old ser.), Report for 1844; Journal of As. Soc. Bengal, vols. v-vii. and Centenary Volume.] O. B.

TUROLDD (fl. 1075-1100), romance-writer, has been considered by some as the author of the 'Chanson de Roland,' whose composition is assigned by the best authorities to the end of the eleventh century. Its attribution to a person of that name, a common enough one in the eleventh century, rests on the last line of the poem in the oldest known manuscript of it in the Bodleian library at Oxford, 'Ci falt la Geste que Turolldus declinet' (i.e. thus ends the Geste which Turolld completes). The 'Geste' is referred to four times in the poem as a sort of historical document, so if Turolld was the author of anything, it was of this previous compilation. But 'declinet' may have two meanings, a primary one of 'finish' and a secondary one of 'relate.' The first is the one most generally adopted. So that Turolld may be the name of either the scribe who wrote that particular manuscript, the author of the 'Geste,' or the jongleur who sang it. The balance of opinion now inclines to the first supposition. The Oxford manuscript was probably written towards the end of the twelfth century. In any case the identification of Turolld with a Turolld Benedictine of Fécamp, to whom William I gave the abbacy of Malmesbury, who removed to Peterborough in 1069 and died in 1098, resting as it does on the bare fact of the existence of two copies of the 'Chanson' in the library of Peterborough Cathedral, is doubtful, as are all attempts to identify the possessor of so common a name in the present state of our knowledge.

[Chanson de Roland, ed. L. Gautier (édition classique), 1892, Introd. p. xxv; Idem, ed. Petit de Julleville, 1876, pp. 15, 16; Wright's Biographia Literaria, ii. 120.] W. E. R.

TURPIN, RICHARD (1700-1739), robber, born in 1700, was the son of John Turpin, a small innkeeper of Hempstead in Essex. The house of his birth is identified with 'The Crown Inn,' opposite which is a circle of nine trees still known as 'Turpin's Ring;' near by, at 'Dawkin's Farm,' is a gigantic oak in which tradition relates that Turpin found refuge from his pursuers (see DAR, Way about Essex, p. 88). Young Turpin was apprenticed to a butcher in Whitochapel, but, having been detected in stealing some cattle from a farmer named Giles of Plumetow, he joined a gang of smugglers and deer-stealers, and took the lead in some brutal robberies in his native county. Selecting lonely farmhouses for attack while the male occupants were away, Turpin and his mates tortured the inmates into yielding up their valuables. A reward of fifty guineas was offered for the apprehension of the gang, and when this was augmented to a hundred, two of the ringleaders were arrested and hanged and the rest intimidated. Shortly after this, in February 1735, Turpin encountered on the Cambridge Road the highwayman Tom King, with whom he is said to have entered into partnership. Having on one occasion lifted a fine horse from a certain Mr. Major near the Green Man in Epping Forest, Turpin retained the animal for his personal use, and was traced through its means to the Red Lion in Whitochapel. A constable was on the point of arresting King for the theft, when Turpin, riding up, fired, but missed his man and shot hisally through the breast. King died of his hurt, but not before he had given some indication of Turpin's haunts, whither huntsmen proceeded with bloodhounds. Turpin nevertheless escaped to Long Sutton, and thence made his way to Yorkshire, where under his mother's name of Palmer he procured and sold horses. He was committed to York Castle on suspicion of horse-stealing early in February 1739. Tried at York assizes on 22 March 1738-9, before Sir William Chapple (1677-1745) [q. v.], for stealing a black mare and foal at Welton, he was found guilty and sentenced to death. He divided 3*l.* 10*s.* among five men to follow the cart as mour-ners, and died with courage at York on 7 April 1739, aged 33. Apart from the slaughter of King, for which he expressed regret, he confessed to one murder and several atrocious robberies. Most of his associates had predeceased him, a circumstance which is said to have elicited from the ordinary the apophthegm—'There is no union so liable to dissolution as that of felons.' His body was rescued from the clutches of a surgeon by the mob, and buried in the churchyard of St. George's church, York. His fetters, weighing twenty-eight pounds, are still shown at York Museum.

The fact of Turpin's migration to the north after shooting King may have suggested to Harrison Ainsworth the interpolation of the well-known legend of this ride to York into his romance of 'Rookwood' (1834), in which 'Dick Turpin' figured prominently. The story was formerly associated with a highwayman known by the sobriquet of 'Nicks,' who in 1676 haunted the Chatham road for the purpose of robbing sailors of their pay. Having robbed a traveller at Had's Hill one morning, says the story (related in Defoe's 'Tour through Great Britain,' i. 138, 5th edit. 1753, and also in the 'Memoirs of Charles Lewis, Baron de Pollnitz,' under date 1 May 1733), 'Nicks,' who was mounted on a splendid bay mare, determined to prove an alibi in case of ill consequences. He rode off at 4 A.M. to Gravesend and, while detained for an hour or so for a boat, baited his horse. Crossing the water, he rode to Chalmersford, where he rested and gave his horse some balls, then through Cambridge and Huntingdon, and, after some brief rests, to York, where he put in an appearance at the Bowling Green at a quarter before eight in the evening (roughly 190 miles in fifteen hours). 'Nicks' or 'Swift Nick' has been identified with John Nevison [q. v.], who may well have had a closer connection with what is probably an ancient myth of the north road than Richard Turpin, a very commonplace ruffian, who owes all his fame to the literary skill of Ainsworth. According to the more circumstantial versions of the legend, Turpin set out upon his adventurous ride from Broadway, Westminster, on his famous mare, 'Black Bess,' whence, says Walcott (Westminster, p. 289), the 'Black Horse,' Broadway, had its name; but unfortunately the 'Black Horse' is mentioned in Stow (ed. 1722). The spot where this same apocryphal black mare sank exhausted to the ground is still pointed out on Yorkrace-course. Equally baseless stories are told of Turpin's being hanged for stealing a bridle or shooting a gamecock, and diatribes against the iniquity of English laws have been based upon these fables (cf. Gent. Mag. 1819 passim). Fabulous, too, in all probability, are the Turpin traditions at Hounslow, at Finchley, and at Enfield, where one of the robber's lurking-places in Camlet-moat is still pointed out. Dick Turpin's 'portman-teau' forms the subject of an engraving in Pink's 'Olerkenwell' (1881, p. 164; cf. THORND, Environs of London; ROBINSON, History and Antiquities of Enfield, 1823, i. 58 n.). The legend was humorously amplified in the well-known ballad in the 'Pickwick Papers.'

[The Trial of the Notorious Highwayman Richard Turpin at York Assizes on 22 March 1739, before the Hon. Sir William Chapple, knt., Judge of Assize and one of His Majesty's Justices of the Court of King's Bench. Taken down in court by Thomas Kylla, professor of shorthand. To which is prefixed an exact account of the said Turpin from his first coming into Yorkshire to the time of his being committed prisoner to York Castle . . . with a copy of a letter which Turpin received from his father while under sentence of death, York, 1739; 4th edition expanded, 1739. Numerous chapbook lives, réchauffés of Ainsworth, have appeared in London and the provinces between 1831 and 1896. See also Cont. Mag. 1739, p. 213; Hargrove's Hist. of York, ii. 310; Twyford and Griffiths's Records of York Castle, 1880, pp. 251-5; Depositions from York Castle, ed. Raine, 1861, p. 279; Tyburn Chronicle, iii. 99-112; Remarkable Trials, pp. 100 sq.; Walford's Old and New London; Wheatley and Cunningham's London, i. 279; Wroth's London Pleasure Gardens, p. 100; Retrospective Review, vii. 283; Notes and Queries, 2nd ser. ix. 386, 433, 3rd ser. xi. 440, 606, 8th ser. viii. 4; Standard, 23 May 1867.]

T. S.

TURQUET DE MAYERNE, SIR THEODORE (1673-1655), physician. [See MAYERNE.]

TURSTIN (d. 1140), archbishop of York. [See THURSTAN.]

TURSWELL THOMAS (1648-1685), canon of St. Paul's, born in 1648 at Bishop's Norton, Lincolnshire, was educated at Eton College (HARWOOD, p. 181). Thence he was elected in 1666 to a scholarship at King's College, Cambridge, being admitted on 23 Aug. On 24 Aug. 1669 he was elected fellow, and he graduated B.A. in 1670 and M.A. in 1674. In 1672-3 he was licensed to practise surgery by the university, and in 1678 to practise physic. He was incorporated at Oxford on 14 July 1679, and is said by Foster to have been licensed to practise medicine in 1678 and to have graduated M.D. in 1684. On 26 Jan. 1675-6

he vainly solicited from Burghley the post of keeper of the library at King's College, Cambridge. He is said to have been steward to John Whitgift [q. v.] while bishop of Worcester, and on 7 Nov. 1680 he was collated to the prebend of Portpoole in St. Paul's Cathedral. He died early in 1684-5, his successor being appointed on 1 March (HENNESSY, Novum Repertorium Londin. p. 45, s.v. 'Thurswell').

Cooper (Athenæ Cantabr. ii. 101) attributes to Turswell the authorship of: 1. 'The Schoolemaster or Teacher of Table Philosophy . . .' London, 1670, 4to; 2nd ed. 1583, 4to. 2. 'A View of certain wonderfull Effects of late Dayes come to Passe . . . written by T. T. this 28 Nov. 1578,' London, 1578, 4to. 3. 'A Myrrour for Martinists . . . published by T. T.,' London, 1590, 4to. The first of these works is usually assigned to Thomas Twyne [q. v.]; its dedication to Alexander Nowell [q. v.], dean of St. Paul's while Turswell was canon, is some presumption in Turswell's favour, but the 'merry jests and delectable devises' of which the fourth book consists are scarcely such as would be dedicated by a canon to his dean (cf. manuscript notes in British Museum copy of the 1583 edit.: HALKETT and LAING, col. 2271). The second work is possibly by Turswell, though Thomas Tymme [q. v.], another of the numerous contemporary T. T.'s, is an equally probable candidate. The third is manifestly not by Turswell, because he died before the Martin Marprelate controversy broke out.

[Works in Brit. Mus. Libr.; Hazlitt's Hand-book and Collections; Cal. State Papers, Dom. 1547-80, p. 515; Brydges's Censura Lit. v. 279; Cooper's Athenæ Cantabr. ii. 101; Foster's Alumni Oxon.; Le Neve's Fasti, ii. 428; Newcourt's Repertorium, i. 200.] A. F. P.

TURTON, JOHN (1735-1806), physician, born in Staffordshire on 15 Nov. 1735, was son of John Turton (1700-1754), physician, of Wolverhampton and of Adelphi Street, London, by his wife Dorothy, only surviving child of Gregory Hickman. Dr. Johnson wrote some verses to this lady, 'To Miss Hickman playing on the Spinnet' (BOSWELL, Life of Johnson, ed. Croker, 1781, p. 29). John entered Queen's College, Oxford, on 23 Oct. 1752, graduating thence B.A. 16 June 1756, and M.A. 31 May 1759. In May 1761 he obtained a Radcliffe travelling fellowship at University College, Oxford, and on 28 Sept. 1761 began to study medicine at Leyden (PNAOCOCH, Index of Leyden Students, 1888). He graduated M.B. from University College 11 Dec. 1762, and M.D. 27 Feb. 1767. He was elected a fellow of the Royal Society on 17 Nov. 1768, and admitted on 5 March 1767. He settled in London, was admitted a candidate at the College of Physicians 24 Sept. 1767, and elected a fellow 30 Sept. 1768. He was a censor in 1769, 1775, 1782, and 1788, and became an elect 25 June 1788. He soon attained a large practice, was physician to the queen's household in 1771, physician in ordinary to the queen in 1782, and in 1707 physician in ordinary to the king and to the Prince of Wales. Having grown rich by his practice, he resigned his post of elect in the College of Physicians and retired to Brasted Place in Kent, which he had purchased from Lord Frederick Campbell and rebuilt. George III gave him a striking clock to put on his house, which was once in the turret of the Horse Guards. He died without issue at Brasted on 14 April 1806, and is buried in the parish church, where he has a white marble sarcophagus. His wife Mary was daughter and coheiress of Joseph Kitchingman of Balk Hall, near Thirsk. On her death on 28 Jan. 1810 Turton's real property, amounting to 9,000*l.* a year, besides 60,000*l.* in the funds, descended by will to his relative, Edmund Peters, who assumed the name of Turton.

[Munk's Coll. of Phys. ii. 281; Foster's Alumni Oxon. 1715-1886; Gent. Mag. 1806, i. 391, 476, 1810 i. 288; Burke's Landed Gentry, 1894; Thomson's Hist. of the Royal Society, 1812.] N. M.

TURTON, THOMAS (1780-1864), bishop of Ely, born in Yorkshire on 25 Feb. 1780, was the son of Thomas Turton of Hatfield, Yorkshire, by his wife Ann, daughter of Francis Harn of Deuby. In 1801 he became a pensioner of Queens' College, Cambridge. Two years afterwards he migrated to Catherine Hall, whence he procured B.A. in 1805, being senior wrangler; but as regards the Smith's prize, he and Samuel Hunter Christie of Trinity College were declared equal. In 1806 he was elected a fellow of his college, and in 1807 he succeeded to the office of tutor. In 1808 he commenced M.A., and he served the office of moderator in the schools for the years 1810, 1811, and 1812. In 1816 he took the degree of B.D.

In 1822 he was appointed Lucasian professor of mathematics, and in 1826 he accepted the college living of Gillingham-cum-Trunton, Norfolk, but was recalled to the university in the following year by his election to the office of regius professor of divinity on the resignation of John Kaye [q. v.], bishop of Bristol. Soon afterwards he was created D.D. by royal mandate. On 5 July 1827 he was collated to the prebend of Heydour-cum-Walton in the cathedral church of Lincoln. In November 1830 he obtained the deanery of Peterborough, vacant by the promotion of James Henry Monk [q. v.] to the see of Gloucester and Bristol. Turton filled this office until 1842, when he was appointed dean of Westminster. In March 1845 he was, on the recommendation of Sir Robert Peel, raised to the see of Ely, vacant by the death of Dr. Joseph Allen. For several years preceding his decease increasing infirmities precluded him from the active discharge of his episcopal functions. He died unmarried at Ely House, Dover Street, Piccadilly, London, on 7 Jan. 1864, and was buried at Kensal Green cemetery, in a grave adjoining that of his friend Dr. Thomas Musgrave, archbishop of York [q. v.]

Turton was a vigorous controversial writer, and at various times entered into conflict with Edward Copleston [q. v.], bishop of Llandaff, on the doctrine of predestination; with Thomas Burgess (1758-1837) [q. v.], bishop of Salisbury, on the character of Porson; with Lord Brougham on natural theology; and with Cardinal Wiseman on the doctrine of the eucharist. He was the author of several other polemical tracts and pamphlets, and also edited William Wilson's 'Illustration of the Method of explaining the New Testament by the early opinions of the Jews and Christians concerning Christ,' Cambridge, 1838, 8vo; and John Hay's 'Lectures on Divinity.' He was opposed to the abolition of religious tests at the universities, and set forth his views in 1834 in a pamphlet entitled 'Thoughts on the Admission of Poreons, without regard to their Religious Opinions, to the Universities' (Cambridge, 8vo; 2nd edit. 1835).

His taste in the fine arts was well known, and he made a valuable collection of pictures. He was the composer of several excellent pieces of church music.

[Daily Telegraph, 9 and 16 Jan. 1864; Dublin Review, 1830, vii. 197; Examiner, 16 Jan. 1864, p. 44; Illustrated London News, 12 March 1864; Le Neve's Fasti, ed. Hardy; Lowndes's Bibl. Man. ed. Bohn; Men of the Time, 1862, p. 264; Morning Post, 9 Jan. 1864; Notes and Queries, 1st ser. xii. 439; Times, 9 Jan. 1864, p. 9, col. 3, 12 Jan. p. 9, col. 1; Ward's Life of Cardinal Wiseman, i. 243.] T. C.

TURTON, WILLIAM (1762-1835), conchologist, born at Olveston on 21 May 1762, was the fifth child of William Turton (1781-1802), solicitor of Olveston, Gloucestershire, and his wife Rachel, only daughter of the Rev. Andrew Outlibert of Monmouth, and on her mother's side a descendant of Edward, eleventh baron Zouche. He matriculated from Oriel College, Oxford, on 28 March 1781, graduating B.A. on 3 Feb. 1785, proceeding M.A. on 22 Feb. 1791, and M.B. on 16 July 1791. He commenced practice in Swansea, his leisure time being devoted to the study of natural history and the publication of various works. About 1797 he married a Miss Salmon, by whom he had a son and three daughters.

From the prefaces to his books it appears that he was still at Swansea in 1807, that from 1813 to 1816 he was in Dublin, in 1819 at Teignmouth, in 1822 at Torquay, and in 1831 at Bideford, where he died on 28 Dec. 1835. He had been elected a fellow of the Linnean Society in 1809.

Turton was author of: 1. 'A Medical Glossary,' London, 1797, 4to; 2nd edit. 1802. 2. 'British Fauna,' vol. i. (all published), Swansea, 1807, 12mo; London, 1810, 8vo, 3. 'Some Observations on Consumption,' London, 1810, 8vo; Dublin, 1813. 4. 'A Conchological Dictionary of the British Islands,' in which he was 'assisted by his daughter,' London, 1819, 12mo. 5. 'Conchylia Insularum Britannicarum' (bivalves only), Exeter, 1822, 4to; reissued as 'Bivalve Shells of the British Islands,' London, 1830, 4to. 6. 'Manual of the Land and Freshwater Shells of the British Islands,' London, 1831, 12mo; another edition, largely rewritten by John Edward Gray [q. v.], 8vo, London, 1840 and 1857. 7. 'A Treatise on Hot and Cold Baths' [no date]. He also wrote, in conjunction with J. F. Kingston, the natural history portion of N. T. Carrington's 'Teignmouth, Dawlish, and Torquay Guide' (Teignmouth [1828?] 8vo). Three papers on scientific subjects were written by him for the 'Zoological Journal' and the 'Magazine of Natural History' between 1826 and 1834. He is also said to have prepared a 'Pocket Flora.'

Turton edited a 'General System of Nature,' translated from Gmelin's last edition of the Systema Naturæ [of Linnaeus], &c. London, 7 vols. 4to [Swansea, printed], 1802-1806, vols. i-v. reprinted in 1808; a new edition of Goldsmith's 'History of the Earth,' 1805 and 1816, 6 vols.; and 'Luctus Nelsoniani. Poemæ [by different authors] on the Death of Lord Nelson, in Latin and English, written for the Turtonian Medals,' London, 1807, 4to.

He gave his collection of shells, before his 'Manual' appeared, to William Clark of Bath. They subsequently passed into the hands of John Gwyn Jeffreys [q. v.], and are now with the latter's collection in the United States National Museum at Washington. Turtonia, a genus of bivalve shells, was named in his honour in 1849 by Forbes and Hanley, who remark, however, that Turton was not always to be relied on in his published statements.

[Biogr. Dict. of Living Authors, 1816; Gent. Mag. 1836, i. 557; Britten and Boulger's Biogr. Index; Foster's Alumni Oxon.; Forbes and Hanley's Hist. Brit. Moll. ii. 81; information kindly supplied by his great-nephew, Major W. H. Turton, R.E.; prefaces and advertisements to his works; British Museum Cat.; Nat. Hist. Museum Cat.; Royal Soc. Cat.] B. B. W.

TUSSAUD, MARIE, MADAME TUSSAUD (1780-1850), founder of the waxwork exhibition known by her name, born at Berne in 1780, was the posthumous daughter of Joseph Gresholtz, a soldier who had served on the staff of General Wurmsier in the seven years' war, by his wife Marie, the widow of a Swiss pastor named Walther. In 1786 she was adopted by her maternal uncle, Johann Wilhelm Christoph Kurtz or Creutz (he subsequently latinised his name into Curtius), under whose auspices she was taken to Paris and taught wax modelling, an art in which she became proficient. Curtius, a German Swiss (though during the revolution from prudential motives he gave himself out to be an Alsatian), migrated to Paris in 1770, and ten years later started a 'Cabinet de Cire' in the Palais Royal. The business was extended in 1788 by the creation of a 'Caverne des grands voleurs' (the nucleus of the 'Chamber of Horrors') in the Boulevard du Temple, in a house formerly occupied by Poulon. Curtius seems to have been a man of taste and conviviality; a mania for modelling in wax was fashionable in Paris, and the 'ceroplastic studio' of M. Curtius in the 'Palais,' owing largely no doubt to its central position, became for a time a popular rendezvous for Parisian notabilities. There as a child Marie Tussaud was spoken of by Voltaire, Rousseau, Franklin, Diderot, Condorcet, and other famous men, and she was even sent for to Versailles to give lessons in flower-modelling to Madame Elisabeth, Louis XVI's sister. On 12 July 1789 a crowd of well-dressed persons obtained from the exhibition in the Palais Royal the busts of Necker and Philippe d'Orléans, and carried the effigies through the city dressed in crape. Two days later Curtius proved his patriotism by taking part in the 'storming' of the Bastille. At the close of the year, as one of the 'vainqueurs de la Bastille,' he was presented by the municipality with an inscribed musket (still preserved at Madame Tussaud's). Three brothers and two uncles of Marie Tussaud were in the Swiss guard, and all perished bravely in defending the Tuileries on 10 Aug. 1792. The safety of Marie and her uncle was ensured by the powerful protection of Collot d'Herbois, from whom Curtius is said to have received some employment under the committee of public safety. He was certainly called upon to model the lifeless heads of a number of victims of the Terror, and of this repulsive work his niece would appear to have had more than her fair share. Marie is said to have been imprisoned for a short time under the Terror, and to have had as a fellow-captive Joséphine de Beauharnais. Her uncle (after 9 Thermidor, 28 July 1794) came under suspicion as a partisan of the organisers of the Terror, and met his death under strong suspicion of poison.

In the meantime Marie had married M. Tussaud, the son of a well-to-do wine grower from Mâcon, and for six years with varying fortune they seem to have carried on the Cabinet de Cire under the name of Curtius. About 1800 she separated from her husband, and in 1802 she got a passport from Fouché and transferred her céro-plastic museum to England. At the outset she planted herself at the Lyceum in the Strand, and her exhibition soon eclipsed the notorious old wax-work of Mrs. Salmon, under whose name four rooms of tableaux in the style of Mrs. Jarley were shown near St. Dunstan's, Fleet Street, from early in the eighteenth century down to 1812 (cf. Spectator, No. 28; Harl. M.S. 5931; Brit. Mus. Cat.) Subsequently Madame Tussaud removed her 'Museum' to Blackheath, and later her figures were displayed in all the large towns of the United Kingdom. Many of them were submerged on one occasion in the Irish Channel, and in the Bristol riots of October 1831 her show was within an ace of being burned to the ground. One of her first catalogues, dated Bristol 1823, is headed 'Biographical and Descriptive Sketches of the whole-length composition Figures and other works of Art forming the Unrivalled Exhibition of Mme. Tussaud (niece to the celebrated Courcis of Paris), and artist to Her late Royal Highness Mme. Elizabeth, sister to Louis XVIII' (Brit. Mus.; an edition of 1827 is described in Notes and Queries, 7th ser. xii.) Among the figures stated to have been taken from life are George III (1809), Napoleon (1815), Josephine (1798), Louis XVIII (1814), Voltaire (March 1778), Robespierre, 'taken immediately after his execution by order of the General Assembly,' Marat, Carrier, Fouquier Tinville, and Hébert. In 1833 the exhibition found a settled home in Baker Street, London. Madame Tussaud's remarkable collection of relics, already including the bloodstained shirt in which Henry IV was assassinated (purchased by Curtius at the Mazarin sale) and the knife and lunette of one of the early guillotines, was greatly enhanced in value in 1842 by the purchase of Napoleon's travelling carriage, built at Brussels for the Moscow campaign in 1812, and captured at Jemappes after the battle of Waterloo ('The Military Carriage of Napoleon,' 1848). Marie Tussaud retained her faculties to the last, and distinguished visitors to the exhibition, from the Duke of Wellington downwards, were entertained by her recollections. When she was over eighty she divided all she possessed between her two sons, Joseph and François (grandfather of John Theodore Tussaud, the present modeller to the exhibition). She died at Baker Street on 18 April 1850, and her remains were placed in the vaults of the Roman catholic chapel in the Fulham Road. A wax model of the old lady is shown in the Marylebone Road, whither the exhibition (now the property of a company) was removed from Baker Street in 1884 (see Times, 14 July 1884).

[The Memoirs of Madame Tussaud, ed. F. Hervé, London, 1838, 8vo (with lithographic portrait of Marie v. Gresholtz in 1778), of which an abridgment appeared in 1878, contains a little information, but its statements must be received with the greatest caution, as it is evidently a réchauffé from Mme. de Campan and similar sources, adapted to suit English prejudices, and bearing little relation to the personal experiences of Madame Tussaud. The original work is becoming scarce. In the Répert. des Connaissances Usuelles, Suppl., Paris, 1868, ii. 477, Madame Tussaud is said to be the mother of Curtius; similar inaccuracies abound. See also Gent. Mag. 1850, ii. 98; Annual Register, 1850; London Reader, 18 Sept. 1865; Timbs's Curiosities of London, pp. 350, 819; Chambers's Book of Days, i. 517; Walford's Old and New London, iv. 419, 420; Darlington's London and Environs, 1898, p. 394; Wheatley and Cunningham's London, iii. 412; Leisure Hour, 1892, p. 182; Chambers's Journal, 27 July 1878; Le Breton's Essai Hist. sur la Sculpture en Cire, Rouen, 1894, p. 81; Intermédiaire des Chercheurs et des Curieux, vol. x. passim; Larousse's Dictionnaire, s.v. 'Cabinet de Cire'; Babean's Paris en 1789, p. 143; Lefouvre's Paris rue par rue, 1875, iii. 426; Dict. de la Conversation, t. vii.; Le Chroniqueur désœuvré on l'espion du Boulevard du Temple, 1782; Mme. Tussaud's Exhibition Catalogue (with an able introduction by George Augustus Sala), 1897.] T. S.

TUSSER, THOMAS (1624?-1680), agricultural writer and poet, was born at Rivonhall, near Witham in Essex. Fuller says he came of an ancient family, and he himself claims to have been of gentle birth, but the family cannot be traced back further than to his grandfather. The date of Tusser's birth is uncertain. Dr. Mavor places it in 1515, on very slender grounds. This date is, however, supported by the entry in the register of the church of St. Mildred, which makes Tusser about sixty-four at his death, and the tablet in the church at Manningtree, which makes him sixty-five. If we accept the tradition referred to by R. B. Gardiner (Admission Reg. of St. Paul's School, p. 463), that he was at St. Paul's School when Lily was headmaster, we should have to place the date of his birth even a few years earlier. As, however, Tusser was elected to King's College, Cambridge, in 1543, and as he would have been ineligible at the age of nineteen, the date of his birth is more probably about 1524.

He was the fourth son of William Tusser and of Isabella, a daughter of Thomas Smith of Rivenhall (Visitations of Essex, 1558, 1612, Harl. Soc. 1878, xiii. 117, 304-5). At an early age he was sent as a chorister to 'Wallingford College,' i.e. the collegiate chapel of the castle of Wallingford in Berkshire, where, as would appear from his own account, he was ill-treated, ill-clothed, and ill-fed. He was hurried from one place to another 'to servo the choir, now there, now here,' by people who had licence to press choristers for the royal service. At last, through the influence, it would appear, of some friends, he became a chorister in St. Paul's Cathedral, under John Redford [q.v.], organist and almoner, 'an excellent musician.' Hence he passed to Eton, where he studied under the famous Nicholas Udall [q.v.], of whose severity he complains in some well-known lines. Harwood (Alumni Etonenses, p. 160) erroneously gives his name as William, and the date of his entry as 1543.

After leaving Eton Tusser stayed for some time in London, and then went to Cambridge. Though he does not mention the fact in his autobiography, he was elected to King's College in 1543 (HARONBE, MSS. Catalog. Prepos. Soc. Schol. Coll. Regal. Cambr.). He removed to Trinity Hall, and has recorded the happy life he passed there among congenial companions. Sickmess compelled him to leave the university, and he joined the court as 'servant' to William Paget, first baron Paget of Beaudesert [q.v.], in the character of musician. This is conclusively proved by his own words in the dedication of his 'Hundreth Pointes' (1557) to that nobleman: 'A care I had to serve that way,' and he contrasts his life at court with his subsequent labours: 'My music since hath been the plough.' In the service of Lord Paget, who was 'good to his servants,' Tusser spent ten years, and then leaving the court—against the wishes, it would seem, of his patron—he married and settled down as a farmer at Cattiwade in Suffolk. Here he composed a 'Hundreth Good Pointes of Husbandrie.' He also introduced into the neighbourhood the culture of barley. But his wife fell ill, and 'could not more toil abide, so nigh sea side,' so Tusser removed to Ipswich, where she died. About the name and the family of this first wife we know nothing; she left Tusser no children. Shortly after her death he married Amy, daughter of Edmund Moon, a marriage which it may be conjectured was not very successful, for Tusser laments the increased expenditure in which 'a wife in youth' involved him. By this wife he had three sons—Thomas, John, and Edmond—and one daughter, Mary.

Tusser then settled down at West Dereham in Norfolk; but in 1559 on the death there of his patron, Sir Robert Southwell [see under SOUTHWELL, SIR ROBERT], he removed to Norwich. Here he found a new protector in John Salisbury, dean of Norwich, through whose influence he got a living, probably as singing-man in the cathedral. Sickmess, however, forced him again to migrate, this time to Fairsted in Essex, the tithes of which place he farmed for some time with little success. He then came to London, and his third son, Edmond, was baptised at St. Giles's, Cripplegate, on 18 March 1572-1573. But the plague which raged in London during 1573-4 forced Tusser to take refuge once again in Cambridge, where he matriculated as a servant of Trinity Hall, at what date is not certainly known. Cambridge would seem, from Tusser's own account, to have been his favourite residence, but he did not settle there, returning to London, where he died on 8 May 1580, a prisoner for debt in the Poultry counter. He was buried in the church of St. Mildred in the Poultry, and his epitaph is recorded by Stow (T. MILBOURN, History of the Church of St. Mildred, 1872, p. 34; Stow, Survey of London, ed. Strype, bk. iii. p. 81).

The first germ of Tusser's work was the 'Hundreth Good Pointes of Husbandrie, imprinted by Richard Tottel, the third day of February, An. 1557.' In the same year (1557) John Daye had license to print the 'Hundreth Poyntes of Good Husserie' (Register Stationers' Hall, A. fol. 23 a). In 1561 Thomas Flacher had license for a 'dyalogue of wyvynge and thryvynge of Tusshers,' a poem which was later incorporated with the 'Husbandry.' Editions of the 'Hundred Points' are also thought to have appeared in 1562 and 1564. In 1570 was published 'A Hundreth Good Pointes of Husbandry, lately married unto a Hundreth Good Poyntes of Huswifery.' In 1573 they were amplified to five hundred, 'Five Hundreth Pointes of Good Husbandry united to as many of Good Huswifery,' and to this edition was prefixed an autobiography in verse, which was amplified in succeeding editions. The 1573 edition was reprinted in 1574 (Brit. Mus.), an edition strangely overlooked by the modern editors, Mavor and Herbage. Further reprints appeared in 1577, 1580, 1585, 1586, 1590, 1593, 1597, 1599 (twice, both by Peter Short in London, and Waldegrave in Edinburgh), 1604, 1610, 1614, 1620, 1638, 1672, 1692. All these sixteenth and seventeenth century editions are in black letter. In 1710 appeared 'Tusser Redivivus,' a reprint of the more practical part of Tusser's work in monthly issues. In this Tusser was brought up to date, and explained in a commentary (by one Daniel Hillman) inserted at the end of each stanza. Another edition of 'Tusser Redivivus' appeared in 1744.

In 1810 the incorrect 1599 edition by Short of Tusser's 'Five Hundred Points' was reprinted in Sir Walter Scott's edition of the 'Somers Tracts' (iii. 403-551). At the same time a reprint of the 'Hundred Points' appeared as part of Sir Egerton Brydges's 'British Bibliographer,' vol. iii. sub fin.; this edition was also reprinted separately in a neat thin quarto volume. In 1812 appeared Mavor's standard edition; in 1834 the 'Hundred Points' were again reprinted from the private press of Charles Clark of Great Totham, Essex; in 1848 a selection was printed at Oxford; in 1878 appeared the English Dialect Society's edition, edited by W. Payne and S. J. Herbage. This consists of a reprint of the 'Five Hundred Points' from the issue of 1580 and of the 'Hundred Points' from that of 1557. Tusser's works also appear in Southey's 'Select Works of the British Poets,' from Chaucer to Johnson, 1831, pp. 148-190.

Southey, who appears to have been a careful student of Tusser (see Commonplace Book, 1851, i. 171-4, 497, 498, ii. 325, 331, iv. 290), speaks of him as a 'good, honest, homely, useful old rhymers.' His verses are not without practical agricultural value, and he has even been styled 'the British Varro' (DAVE). 'There is nowhere to be found,' says Sir Walter Scott, 'excepting perhaps in Swift's "Directions to Servants," evidence of such rigid and minute attention to every department of domestic economy. . . . Although neither beauty of description nor elegance of diction was Tusser's object, he has frequently attained, what better indeed suited his purpose, a sort of homely, pointed and quaint expression, like that of the old English proverb, which the rhyme and the alliteration tend to fix on the memory of the reader.' It is indeed surprising how many English proverbs can be traced back to Tusser. It has been customary to contrast the shrewdness of Tusser's maxims with the apparent ill-success of his life; this idea is dwelt on in Peacham's 'Minerva' (1612), in an epigram which also appeared in a terser form as follows:

Tusser, they tell me when thou wert alive
'Thou, teaching thrift, thyself couldst never thrive;
So, like the whetstone, many men are wont
To sharpen others when themselves are blunt.

The same idea runs through Fuller's account in his 'Worthies of England': 'This stone of Sisyphus could gather no moss; 'He spread his bread with all sorts of butter, yet none would stick thereon;' 'None being better at the theory or worse at the practice of husbandry.'

[Tusser's Metrical Autobiography, in the 1573 and later editions of his Husbandry; Cox's Select Works of Benjamin Stillingfleet, vol. ii. pt. ii. p. 563; Fuller's Worthies of England, Essex, 1662, i. 335; Warton's Hist. of English Poetry, ed. Price, 1840, vol. iii. § liii. pp. 248-57; Risson's Bibliographia Poetica, 1802; Davy's Athense Sullustenses apud Addit. MS. 19165 f. 225; Hawkins's General Hist. of Music, 1858, ii. 537; Sir Walter Scott's sketch in Somers Tracts, iii. 408-7; Mavor's Tusser, 1812, pp. 5-34; Payne and Herbage's Tusser, 1878, pp. xi-xxxi; Notes and Queries, 1st ser. xii. 119, 193, 5th ser. xi. 416, 6th ser. x. 40.] E. C.-M.

TUTCHIN, JOHN (1661?-1707), whig pamphleteer, was born about 1661, probably in Hampshire or the Isle of Wight (cf. Observer, iii. No. 87). He himself says (ib. 17 to 20 May, 8 to 12 July 1704) that he was born a freeman of the city of London, and that his father, grandfather, and several of his uncles were nonconformist ministers. No doubt he was nearly related to the Rev. Robert Tutchin of Newport, Isle of Wight, who, like his three sons, was ejected in 1662 (PALMER, The Nonconformist's Memorial, 1802, i. 849, ii. 202, 276-6). Tutchin seems to have been at school at Stepney, and is said by a detractor to have been expelled for stealing (The Devil turned Linner, 1704).

In 1685 Tutchin published 'Poems on several Occasions, with a Pastoral [The Unfortunate Shepherd], to which is added a Discourse of Life.' In the summer of the same year he took part in the Duke of Monmouth's rising, and was tried before Judge Jeffreys at the 'Bloody Assizes' held at Dorchester in the autumn. Tutchin and others had raised men at Lymington, and Jeffreys sentenced him to imprisonment for seven years, and yearly to be whipped through all the market towns in Dorset; to pay a fine of a hundred marks, and to find security for good behaviour during life. 'You are a rebel,' said Jeffreys, 'and all your family have been rebels since Adam. They tell me that you are a poet. I'll cap verses with you.' Eventually Jeffreys was bribed to recommend a pardon. Afterwards, when Jeffreys was in the Tower, Tutchin visited him; Jeffreys pleaded that he had acted only in accordance with his instructions, and Tutchin, who had gone to revile, came away somewhat mollified at the spectacle of the fallen tyrant (MACAULAY, History, chaps. v. xiv.)

After the accession of William III, Tutchin published 'An Heroick Poem upon the late Expedition of his Majesty to rescue England from Popery, Tyranny, and Arbitrary Government,' 1689, and 'The British Muse: or Tyranny exposed. A Satire; occasioned by all the fulsome and lying Posms and Elegies that have been written on the Death of the late King James' (1701). He also printed 'A Congratulatory Poem to the Rev. John Tillotson upon his Promotion to the Archiepiscopal See of Canterbury,' 1691; 'The Earthquake of Jamaica, described in a Pindarick Poem,' 1692; and 'A Pindarick Ode in praise of Folly and Knavery,' 1696. About 1692 a clerkship was found for him in the victualling office, with a salary of about 40*l.* and fees. In 1696, however, he accused the commissioners of cheating the king of vast sums of money. He did not establish his case, and was dismissed (Mr. William Fuller's Letter to Mr. John Tutchin, 1703; The whole Life of Mr. William Fuller, 1703, p. 70). Tutchin is sometimes called 'captain,' and he appears to have been in the army in Ireland at some time during King William's reign (The Examination, Tryal, and Condemnation of Rebellion Ob[servator], 1703, p. 15).

On 1 Aug. 1700 there appeared 'The Foreigners: a Poem,' which Defoe called 'a vile abhorred pamphlet in very ill verse,' attacking the king and the Dutch nation. It is remembered as having provoked Defoe's answer, 'The True-born Englishman.' Tutchin was arrested by 'August 10 . . . his poem containing reflections upon several great men' (LUTTRELL, Brief Relation of State Affairs, iv. 676; Mr. W. Fuller's Letter to Mr. J. Tutchin). Fuller, who attributes all his own crimes to Tutchin's influence, says that it was Tutchin who induced him to publish the 'Original Letters of King James' in 1700 (Whole Life of Mr. W. Fuller). Fuller says that Tutchin was the author of 'The Mouse grown a Rat' (January 1702), in which parliament was attacked for censoring Fuller (Letter to Tutchin).

On 1 April 1702 Tutchin issued the first number of a periodical, 'The Observer,' in a single folio sheet, in imitation of the paper issued by Sir Roger L'Estrange [q. v.] in 1681. He was paid sometimes half a guinea and sometimes twenty shillings for each number (HOWELL, State Trials, xiv. 1106, 1128). After eight weekly numbers this paper appeared twice a week, and the first three volumes, each of a hundred numbers, were afterwards issued with title-pages and prefaces. Tutchin soon adopted the form of a dialogue between the 'Observer' and a countryman, and in this manner attacked the Tories, with frequent onslaughts upon the immorality of the day, and players and playhouses in particular. In August 1702 he printed 'A Vindication of the Observer in answer to a scandalous Libel lately printed, called the Observer observed.' A Tory reply to Tutchin's paper, 'The Rehearsal,' by Charles Leslie [q. v.], was commenced on 5 Aug. 1704, the first number being called 'The Observer,' and the fifth 'The Rehearsal of Observer.' Tutchin's periodical was continued after his death for the benefit of his widow, and lingered on until 1712, when it was killed by the stamp tax.

'A Dialogue between a Dissenter and the Observer concerning the "Shortest Way with the Dissenters,"' published by Tutchin early in 1703, was chiefly in defence of Defoe, to whose honesty he testifies (WILSON, Life and Times of Daniel Defoe, ii. 82). In July 1708 he was prosecuted by the attorney-general. Tutchin says that the indictment was for writing against the papists, and that the grand jury ignored the bill (Observer, vol. ii. Nos. 27, 28).

An attack on the administration of the navy led to a resolution of the House of Commons (15 Dec. 1708) that Tutchin should attend a committee to answer what might be objected against him, and that a bill should be brought in to restrain the licentiousness of the press (LUTTRELL, Brief Relation, v. 370). On 3 Jan. 1704 the house ordered Tutchin's arrest. He lay concealed in the country, but in May he surrendered and gave 1,000*l.* bail, and on the 29th he appeared in court and renewed the bail (Observer, vol. iii, No. 18; LUTTRELL, v. 425, 429).

The trial took place on 4 Nov. 1704 at the Guildhall. Tutchin pleaded not guilty, but the jury, after a quarter of an hour's retirement, found him guilty. The sentence was to be as the judges of the court of queen's bench thought fit (Trial and Examination of Mr. John Tutchin for writing a certain Libel, called the Observer, fol.) Technical pleas against the conviction were raised by Tutchin's counsel, and on 28 Nov., after several adjournments, the verdict was set aside, and 'it was never afterwards thought fit to try him again' (HOWELL, State Trials, xiv. 1095-1199; LUTTRELL, Brief Relation, v. 488, 487, 489, 490, 492). Next month Tutchin attended before a committee of the House of Lords appointed to discover how the French fleet had been furnished with naval stores and provisions from England, and gave evidence (ib. v. 494-5). In April 1705 he appeared in the court of queen's bench upon his recognisances, and again in June, when he was discharged (ib. v. 544, 561).

During 1705 Tutchin was often attacked in conjunction with Defoe. He wrote a ballad satirising the members who voted for the Tack, and was answered in 'The Tuckers vindicated . . . with a word to Mr. John Tutchin about his scandalous ballad, that goes to the tune of "One Hundred and thirty-four."' Tutchin was also attacked in a lampoon aimed at Defoe, 'Daniel the Prophet no Conjuror', 1705. Afterwards Tutchin wrote against Defoe's 'Consolidator' (WILSON, Life and Times of Defoe, ii. 302-4, 344); but as they were working for the same ends, Defoe was anxious to avoid a conflict, and says he often invoked Tutchin to peace (ib. ii. 416). 'England's Happiness considered, in some Expedients. By John Tutchin, gent.,' appeared in 1705. Defoe challenged Tutchin to a contest in translating languages (Review, ii. 149, 150). In August Tutchin was in the west, on purpose, Hearne says (Collections, od. Noble, i. 40), to rake up scandal against staunch members of the church of England, 'which being hinted to the judges in our place (as they were on their circuit), he was forced to fly immediately.' Early in 1706 Sharpe, curate of Stopney, published 'An Appeal of the Clergy of the Church of England to my Lords the Bishops. . . . With some Reflections upon the Presbyterian Eloquence of John Tutchin and Daniel Defoe. . . . To which is annexed as a postscript, The case of the Curate of Stopney fairly and truly stated, and cleared from the vile Aspersions of John Tutchin.' Here Sharpe speaks of Tutchin's 'Stepney academical learning.'

Tutchin died on 28 Sept. 1707 in the queen's bench prison at the Mint, according to Hearne (Collections, ii. 53); according to others his death was the result of the personal vengeance of some of his enemies (NORRIS, Continuation of Granger, 1806, ii. 312). Pope's well-known lines (Dunciad, ii. 146) couple him with Defoe:

Earless on high, stood unabashed Defoe,
And Tutchin, flagrant from the scourge below.

Tutchin was much given to exposing scandals and to boasting of his own virtue and public spirit, and it is clear, from his relations with Defoe, that he quarrelled with political allies as well as with opponents. Dunton, however, spoke enthusiastically of the 'loyal and ingenious Tutchin,' 'a gentleman of invincible courage and bravery,' 'a loyal, witty, honest, brave man' (Life and Errors, pp. 356, 426-8, 727; cf. Lynn's Life of Defoe, p. 146). Edward Ward [q. v.] prefixed to his 'Secret History of the Calves' Head Club' a dedication to Tutchin: 'Observer and censor morum general.' There is an engraving of Tutchin by Vanderghucht, and another in Caulfield's 'Portraits,' i. 161, and his head appears in two contemporary caricatures, 'The Funeral of the Low Church' and 'Faction Display'd' (Cut. of Prints and Drawings in the British Museum, ii. 285, 311).

On 30 Sept. 1686 John Tutchin of St. Mildred's, Bread Street, gent., aged 25, and Mrs. Elizabeth Hicks of Newington Green, aged 22, were licensed to marry at St. John's Coleman Street. She was the daughter of the presbyterian minister, John Hickes or Hicks [q. v.], and was sufficiently educated to keep a girls' school after Tutchin's death, first at Newington Green, and afterwards, in 1710, near the Nag's Head, Highgate, 'with good accommodation for lodgers' (cf. Flying Post, 12 to 14 Feb. 1712).

Besides the pieces mentioned above, Tutchin is said to be the author of 'The Merciful Assize,' Taunton, 1701; 'The Review of the Rehearsal' (HEARNE, Collections, i. 35); 'The Tribe of Levi,' 1691; and 'The Apostates, or the noble Cause of Liberty deserted,' 1702 (Whole Life of Mr. W. Fuller). He also issued proposals for printing 'A View of the present State of the Clothing Trade in England,' but apparently the necessary subscriptions were not received.

[The principal sources from which information about Tutchin can be gleaned have been cited in the text. See also Mr. Humphreys's paper on the Monmouth Rebellion in the Proc. of the Somersetshire Archaeological and Nat. Hist. Soc. for 1892, and H. B. Irving's Life of Jeffreys, 1898, pp. 292-5.] G. A. A.

TUTHILL, SIR GEORGE LEMAN (1772-1835), physician, born at Halesworth in Suffolk on 16 Feb. 1772, was the only son of John Tuthill, an attorney at Halesworth, by his wife Sarah, only daughter of James Jermyn of the same place. He received his education at Bungay under Mr. Reeve, and on 8 June 1790 was admitted sizar at Caius College, Cambridge. He was scholar of the college from Michaelmas 1790 to Michaelmas 1796. He graduated B.A. in 1794 (fifth wrangler), and was subsequently elected to present a university address to the king. Shortly after graduating he married Maria, daughter of Richard Smith of Halesworth. Having gone to Paris with his wife, he was included among the numerous English déportés; after a captivity of several years his wife was recommended to make a direct appeal to the generosity of the first consul. She presented her petition to Napoleon on his return from hunting, with a result that in a few days she and her husband were on their road to England. Tuthill then returned to Cambridge, proceeded M.A. in 1809, had a licence ad practicandum from the university dated 25 Nov. 1812, and graduated M.D. in 1816. He was elected a fellow of the Royal Society in 1810, and was admitted an inceptor candidate of the College of Physicians on 12 April 1813, a candidate on 30 Sept. 1816, and a fellow on 30 Sept. 1817. He was Guletonian lecturer in 1818, and censor in 1819 and 1830. He was knighted on 28 April 1820. He was physician to the Westminster and to the Bridewell and Bethlehem hospitals, both of which appointments he held to the day of his death. He was a sound classical scholar and a good chemist. He was one of the most active members of the committee for the preparation of the 'Pharmacopœia Londinensis' of 1824, and was responsible for the language of the work itself. He published an English version coincidentally with the original. He was also engaged on the 'Pharmacopœia' of 1836, but died before it appeared.

He was appointed to deliver the Harveian oration on 25 June 1835, and, with Sir Henry Hallard [q. v.] and William George Maton [q. v.], was actively engaged in effecting wholesome reforms at the Royal College of Physicians in 1835.

He died at his house in Cavendish Square on 7 April 1835, and was buried at St. Albans on the 14th of the same month. There is a monument to his and his wife's memory at Cransford in Suffolk. He left an only daughter, Laura Maria, married to Thomas Bowett, a solicitor in London. His fine library was sold by Sotheby on 20 and 27 June 1835.

Besides the work mentioned he was the author of 'Vindiciæ Medicæ, or a Defence of the College of Physicians,' 1834, 8vo.

[Munk's Coll. of Phys. iii. 171; Gent. Mag. 1835, ii. 97; J. G. Alger's Englishmen in the French Revolution, p. 267; Cat. Brit. Mus. Library; Records of Caius Coll. Cambridge; Davy's Suffolk Pedigrees, in Addit. MS. 19152, ff. 215-26; Davy's Athenæ Suffol., in Addit. MS. 19167, f. 401.] W. W. W.

TUTTLETT, LAWRENCE (1825-1897), hymn-writer, born at Cloyton, Devonshire, in 1825, was the son of John Tuttle, a surgeon in the royal navy. He was educated at Christ's Hospital and at King's College, London. He originally intended to devote himself to the study of medicine, but, changing his purpose, he was ordained deacon in 1843, and priest in the year following. At the beginning of his ministry he was under the influence of Kingsley and Maurice, but in later life he adopted the high-church principles of Pusey. In 1848 he became curate at St. Paul's, Knightsbridge, where William James Early Bennett was then vicar, and between 1849 and 1853 was successively curate of St. Thomas and Holy Trinity churches, Ryde. In 1853 he was appointed vicar of Lea Marston in Warwickshire, and in 1870 rector of St. Andrews in Scotland. In 1877 he was nominated canon of St. Ninian's Cathedral, Perth. He died at 3 Abbotsford Crescent, St. Andrews, on 21 May 1897.

Tuttle is best known as a hymn-writer. In 1861 he published 'Hymns for Churchmen,' which he followed in 1862 by 'Hymns for the Children of the Church,' and in 1866 by 'Through the Clouds: Thoughts in Plain Verse' (London, 8vo). His hymns are distinguished by smoothness, simplicity of style, and deep earnestness. Several of them have come into very general use. Among the best known are: 'Father, let me dedicate,' and 'Oh quickly come, dread Judge of all.' He also published many devotional treatises, including 'Amen: its true Meaning and proper Use,' London, 1868, 8vo, and 'Meditations on the Book of Common Prayer,' London, 1872, 8vo.

[Julian's Dictionary of Hymnology; Daily Chronicle, 24 May 1897; Clergy Lists.]

E. I. O.

TWEDDELL, JOHN (1769-1799), classical scholar, son of Francis Tweddell, was born on 1 June 1769 at Threepwood, near Hexham. He was educated at Hartforth school, near Richmond, Yorkshire, and at Trinity College, Cambridge. He was a friend, but not, as often stated, a pupil, of Dr. Samuel Parr (Remains of John Tweddell, 2nd ed. p. vii). He graduated B.A. and won the second chancellor's medal in 1790, proceeding M.A. in 1793. He gained all the Browne medals in 1788 and two of the three in 1789, and the members' prize in 1791. He was elected fellow of Trinity in 1792, and in the same year he published 'Prolusiones Juveniles,' being his prize compositions in Greek, Latin, and English.

Tweddell entered at the Middle Temple in 1792. But he had no taste for law, and wished to become a diplomatist. With the object of studying the manners and institutions of European and Asiatic peoples, and of making the acquaintance of foreign politicians and scholars, he started on a tour in the autumn of 1795, visiting Hamburg, Germany, Switzerland, Russia, Poland, and several parts of the east. During his travels he sent home a series of letters that show an accurate observation and the vastness of the stores of knowledge he was accumulating. But the main part of his time was occupied in entering in his journals in minute detail all that he learned. A large part of these journals was deposited at Pera with Thomas Thornton (d. 1814) [q. v.], as the volumes were too bulky to carry about. Tweddell engaged Preaux, an able French artist whom he met at Constantinople, to tour with him in Greece, and to assist him to copy at Athens 'not only every temple and every archway, but every stone and every inscription, with the most scrupulous fidelity.' While engaged in archaeological work at Athens he died of fever on 25 July 1799. He was buried at his own request in the Theseum, and, as the result of the exertions of Lord Byron and others, a block of marble that had been cut from the bas-reliefs of the Parthenon was afterwards erected over his grave, with a Greek inscription written by the Rev. Robert Walpole. Many memorial verses were composed in Tweddell's honour by scholars of both universities.

After Tweddell's death Lord Elgin [see BRUNN, THOMAS, seventh EARL OF ELGIN], on arriving at Constantinople as ambassador to the Porte, ordered his collections to be sent to him. He stated that he consigned all that came into his hands to a friend of the family in England, and his chaplain, Dr. Philip Hunt, declared the statement to be true. The journals and pictures mysteriously disappeared, and Tweddell's brother subsequently accused Elgin of appropriating them.

It is certainly remarkable that neither Elgin nor Hunt could at a later time give any clear account of the matter. But Tweddell's brother failed to prove his charge, and all that could be sustained against Elgin was considerable negligence and some indifference. His answer to the charge was not published till 1815. Tweddell's brother was supported by Dr. Clark, by Thornton, and by John Spencer Smith, Elgin's predecessor. The collections were never traced.

[The charges against Elgin are discussed in the Quarterly Review, 1815, xiv. 267, and Edinburgh Review, 1814, xxv. 285; Hunt's Narrative of what is known respecting the literary remains of J. T., London, 1816; Elgin's letter to the Edinburgh Review; Blackwood, vii. 179; Allibone's Dict.] E. C. M.

TWEDDELL, RALPH HART (1843-1895), engineer and inventor of the hydraulic riveter, son of Marshall Tweddell, a shipowner, was born at South Shields on 25 May 1843, and educated at Cheltenham College. In 1861 he was articled to R. & W. Hawthorn of Newcastle-on-Tyne, engineers. During his apprenticeship, on 9 May 1865, he took out a patent (No. 1282) for a portable hydraulic apparatus for fixing the ends of boiler tubes in tube plates. The pressure of water was from one to one and a half ton on the square inch. When the force-pump did not form part of the machine itself, the connection was made by a copper pipe, which was flexible to allow of the movement of the machine. The results were so encouraging as to suggest the employment of hydraulic power for machines used in boiler construction (Min. of Proc. of Institution of Civil Engineers, lxxiii. 65).

In 1865 he designed a stationary hydraulic riveting machine, which he patented on 23 Aug. 1866 (No. 2158). The plant, consisting of a pump, an accumulator, and a riveter, was first used by Thompson, Boyd & Co., of Newcastle. The work was done perfectly and at one-seventh of the cost of hand work. The surplus power was applied to hydraulic presses for 'setting' angle and tee irons, and it was proved that the wear and tear of the moulds and dies were greatly reduced. The difficulty, often found, of getting the work to the machine induced Tweddell to turn his attention to the design of a portable riveter. The first portable machine was made in 1871, and used by Armstrong, Mitchell, & Co. at Newcastle. Two years later the machine was employed in riveting in situ the lattice-girder bridge carrying Primrose Street over the Great Eastern railway at Bishopsgate Street station in London. This work was successfully accomplished, and since that time the plant has been used for riveting bridges in all parts of the world. Other uses of applying the portable machines were soon found, such as the riveting of locomotive boilers, gun-carriages, agricultural machinery, and wrought-iron under-frames for railway carriages, and progress was made in its application to the riveting of ships.

In 1874 the French government adopted Tweddell's system in their shipbuilding yard at Toulon (Proc. of Instit. of Mechanical Engineers, 1878, p. 346). A similar plant was subsequently erected at the shipyard of the Forges et Chantiers de la Loire at Penhouet, part of the town of St. Nazaire. The largest of the machines at Penhouet exerted fifty tons pressure, but one was constructed in 1883 for the naval arsenal at Brest with a pressure equal to a hundred tons. It is difficult to overestimate the importance of the changes which he effected in the construction of boiler, bridge, and shipbuilding works. Not only is the work turned out of a better and more reliable description, but without the aid of his machinery much of that now produced could not be accomplished.

He wrote papers 'On Machine Tools and Labour-saving Appliances worked by Hydraulic Pressure,' and on 'Forging by Hydraulic Pressure' (Min. of Proc. of Instit. of Civil Engineers, lxxviii. 64, and cxvii. 1). For the former he was awarded the Telford medal and premium. To the Institution of Mechanical Engineers he sent three papers, the most important being 'On the Application of Water Pressure to Shop-tools and Mechanical Engineering Works' (Proceedings, 1872 p. 188, 1874 p. 166, 1878 p. 45, and 1881 p. 293). The Society of Arts gave him a gold medal under the Howard Trust 'for his system of applying hydraulic power to the working of machine tools, and for the riveting and other machines which he has invented in connection with that system' (Journal of Soc. of Arts, xxxiii. 949). In 1880 he was awarded a Bessemer premium for a paper entitled 'The Application of Water Pressure to Machine Tools and Appliances' (Trans. Soc. of Engineers, 1885 p. 35). On 2 Dec. he was elected an associate of the Institution of Civil Engineers, and was made a member on 25 Feb. 1879. He was also a member of the Institution of Mechanical Engineers from 1867. He was a keen sportsman, and believed that he did better work for an occasional day's hunting, shooting, or fishing. He died at Meopham Court, near Gravesend, Kent, on 8 Sept. 1895, having married in 1875 Hannah Mary, third daughter of G. A. Grey of Milfield, Northumberland.

[Min. of Proc. of Instit. Civil Engineers, 1896, cxviii. 437-40, Proc. of Instit. of Mechanical Engineers, 1895, pp. 544-6, Times, 11 Sept. 1896.] G. C. B.

TWEEDDALE, MARQUISES OF. [See HAY, JOHN, second earl and first marquis, 1626-1697; HAY, JOHN, second marquis, 1645-1713; HAY, JOHN, fourth marquis, d. 1762; HAY, GEORGE, eighth marquis, 1787-1876; and HAY, ARTHUR, ninth marquis, 1824-1878.]

TWEEDIE, ALEXANDER (1794-1884), physician, was born in Edinburgh on 29 Aug. 1794, and received his early education at the Royal High School of that city. In 1809 he commenced his medical studies at the university of Edinburgh, and about the same time becoming a pupil of a surgeon to the Royal Infirmary, named Wishart, distinguished himself in Edinburgh for his skill in ophthalmic diseases. On 1 Aug. 1815 Tweedie took the degree of M.D., and, turning his attention to surgical pathology, in 1817 became a fellow of the Edinburgh College of Surgeons. He was then elected one of the two house-surgeons to the Edinburgh Royal Infirmary, Robert Liston (1794-1847) [q. v.] being the other. In 1818 Dr. Tweedie commenced practice in Edinburgh with the view of devoting himself to ophthalmic surgery, but in 1820 he removed to London, took a residence in Ely Place, and on 25 June 1822 was admitted a licentiate of the College of Physicians. He became a fellow of the college on 4 July 1838, was conciliarus in 1853, 1854, and 1855, and Lumsian lecturer in 1856 and 1859. In 1866 he was elected an honorary fellow of the King's and Queen's College of Physicians in Ireland.

In 1822 he was appointed assistant physician to the London Fever Hospital, and in 1824, on the retirement of John Armstrong (1784-1829) [q. v.], physician to the hospital, an office which he filled for thirty-eight years. He resigned it in 1861, when he was appointed consulting physician and one of the vice-presidents. In 1836 he was elected physician to the Foundling Hospital; he was also physician to the Standard Assurance Company, examiner in medicine at the university of London, and was an honorary member of the Medical Psychological Association. He was elected a fellow of the Royal Society on 8 Feb. 1838. He died at his residence, Bute Lodge, Twickenham, on 30 May 1884, continuing to practice at the age of eighty-nine years.

Dr. Tweedie was a voluminous writer. He was joint-author with C. Gaselee of 'A Practical Treatise on Cholera,' 1832, 8vo, and was the original and sole projector of the 'Cyclopedia of Practical Medicine' (London, 1831-5, 4 vols. 8vo), comprising treatises on the nature and treatment of diseases, materia medica and therapeutics, and medical jurisprudence. Tweedie was a large contributor, and was one of the editors. He planned and edited the 'Library of Medicine,' in eight volumes, which appeared in 1840-42, 8vo; and was the author of 'Clinical Illustrations of Fever' (London, 1828, 8vo), and of 'Lectures on the Distinctive Characters, Pathology, and Treatment of Continued Fevers,' 1862, 8vo.

[Lancet, 1884; Edinburgh Medical Journal, 1884; Munk's Coll. of Phys. iii. 252; Churchill's Medical Directory; Records of the Royal Society; Cat. Brit. Mus. Library; Records of Royal High School, Edinburgh.] W. W. W.

TWEEDIE, WILLIAM MENZIES (1826-1878), portrait-painter, born at Glasgow in 1826, was the son of David Tweedie, a lieutenant in the marines. He was himself intended for the navy, but at six years of age he already showed such a talent for drawing portraits that his father was persuaded to allow him to study art. He entered the Edinburgh Academy at the age of sixteen, and remained there for four years, gaining a prize for the best copy of Etty's picture, 'The Combat.' In 1843 he exhibited a portrait in oils at the Royal Scottish Academy. In 1846 he came to London and became a student at the Royal Academy. He afterwards studied for three years at Paris under Thomas Couture. In 1847 his 'Summer' appeared at the Royal Academy, but he did not exhibit there again till 1856, when he sent a portrait of (Sir) Austen Henry Layard. From that year till 1859 he resided in Rodney Street, Liverpool. He exhibited four pictures, studies and figure-subjects, at the British Institution, 1857-60, and thirty-three in all, portraits with a very few exceptions, at the Royal Academy. He settled in London in 1859, and resided at first in Baker Street, but after 1862 at 44 Piccadilly. His pictures were not always accepted at the Royal Academy, and after 1874 they were invariably refused. This failure affected his health, and he died on 19 March 1878.

[Rodgrave's Dict. of Artists; Graves's Dict. of Artists; Royal Academy Cat.] O. D.

TWELLS, LEONARD, D.D. (d. 1742), divine, received his education at Jesus College, Cambridge, whence he graduated B.A.

in 1701 (Graduati Cantabr.) In 1722 he was presented to the vicarage of St. Mary's, Marlborough, Wiltshire (WAYLEN, Hist. of Marlborough, p. 506). He took the degree of M.A. at Oxford by diploma, 7 Dec. 1733, and was created D.D. in that university, 7 July 1740 (FORSTER, Alumni Oxon.) In 1737 he was presented to the united rectories of St. Matthew, Friday Street, and St. Peter, Cheapside, London. He was also a prebendary of St. Paul's, and one of the lecturers at St. Dunstan-in-the-West. He died at Islington on 19 Feb. 1741-2, leaving a large family very destitute.

His works are: 1. 'A Critical Examination of the late new Text and Version of the New Testament, wherein the editor [William Mace]'s corrupt text, false version, and fallacious notes are detected and censured,' 3 parts, London, 1731-2, 8vo. 2. 'A Vindication (and a Supplement to the Vindication) of the Gospel of St. Matthew, against a late tract entitled A Dissertation or inquiry concerning the canonical authority of the Gospel according to St. Matthew,' 2 pts. London, 1735, 8vo. 3. 'A Second Vindication of the Gospel of St. Matthew,' London, 1735, 8vo. 4. 'An Answer to the Enquiry into the meaning of Demoniacs in the New Testament,' London, 1737, 8vo. 5. 'An Answer to the Further Enquiry into the meaning of Demoniacs in the New Testament [by Arthur Ashley Sykes], in a second letter to the author,' London, 1738, 8vo. 6. An edition, published by subscription, of 'The Theological Works of Dr. Peacock, To which is prefixed an account of his life and writings,' London, 1740, fol. 7. 'Twenty-four Sermons preached . . . at the lectures founded by the Hon. R. Boyle, and eight Sermons preached . . . at the lectures founded by the Lady Moyer,' 2 vols. London, 1743, 8vo; 2nd edit. 1755.

[Addit. MSS. 5820 f. 189, 5882 f. 65; Gent. Mag. 1742 p. 107, 1867 i. 209; Lewis's Islington, p. 454; Malcolm's Londinium Redivivum, iv. 487; Nichols's Bibl. Topographica Britannica, iii. 189; Nichols's Illustr. of Literature; Nichols's Lit. Anecd. i. 465-72, ii. 25, iii. 98, vi. 454; Notes and Queries, 2nd ser. xi. 123; Memoirs of Dr. Stukeley, i. 333.] T. C.

TWING, ROBERT DN (1205?-1268?), opponent of Henry III's foreign ecclesiastics. [See THWING.]

TWINE. [See TWYNN.]

TWINING, RICHARD (1749-1824), director of the East India Company and head of the old tea business in the Strand, descended from a family which can be traced from the beginning of the fifteenth century at Tewkesbury, near which is the village of Twining. For over two centuries the family lived in the vale of Evesham, at Pershore, and at Painswick in Gloucestershire, where the parish register contains 102 Twining baptisms between 1551 and 1798. From Painswick Thomas Twining, born in 1675, went to London with his father; he settled first in St. Giles's, Cripplegate, and then about 1710 founded the tea business at Tom's coffee-house, Devereux Court, Strand, where it is still carried on. He was a freeman of the Weavers' Company. On his death in 1741 his only son Daniel succeeded to the business, and, having twice married, left three sons, Thomas [q. v.], Richard, and John.

Richard (Daniel's son by his second wife, Mary Little) was born at Devereux Court in 1749, and educated at Eton. He entered the tea business at the age of sixteen, succeeded to the entire management in 1771 (joined eleven years later by his brother John), and participated in the extraordinary development of the tea trade caused by the operation of Pitt's Commutation Act in 1784-6, during the drafting of which the minister repeatedly consulted him. The result of the sweeping reduction of the tea duty by this act was the practical extinction of tea smuggling, which had been previously carried on extensively in Holland. In 1793 Twining was elected a director of the East India Company. He had previously published three papers of 'Remarks' on the tea trade of the company, and one of his first acts was to carry a self-denying motion prohibiting directors from trading with India; he took a prominent part in the affairs of the court until his resignation in 1816 in consequence of weakened health. He was a considerable traveller, and his tours on the continent and in England formed the subject of copious journals and letters to his half-brother Thomas, extracts from which were published by his grandson, the present Richard Twining, in 1887, with the title of 'Selections from Papers of the Twining Family.' They show scholarship, considerable reading, and humour. He died on 23 April 1824.

By his marriage, in 1771, to Mary Aldred of Norwich, he had six sons and four daughters. The eldest son, RICHARD TWINING (1772-1857), born on 5 May 1772 at Devereux Court, Strand, was educated under Samuel Parr [q. v.] at Norwich grammar school, and in 1794 entered the tea business, to which he devoted seventy years of almost unmitigated labour until within five weeks of his death on 14 Oct. 1857. He was appointed chairman of the committee of by-laws at the East India House, and, carrying on the scholarly habits of his father and uncle, was an old member of the Society of Arts and a fellow of the Royal Society. By his marriage to Elizabeth Mary, daughter of the Rev. John Smythies, on 5 May 1802, he had nine children, of whom the eldest son, Richard, succeeded to the business, and edited his grandfather's and granduncle's correspondence.

The second Richard Twining's daughter, ELIZABETH TWINING (1805-1889), promoted many philanthropic and educational schemes, was the first to organise 'mothers' meetings' in London, took part in founding Bedford College for girls, and during her residence at the old family 'Dial House' at Twickenham restored the parish almshouses and established St. John's Hospital. Besides numerous religious and philanthropic writings, such as 'Ten Years in a Ragged School' (1857) and 'Readings for Mothers' Meetings,' the earliest publication of its kind, she wrote and painted various botanical works, of which the most remarkable was 'Illustrations of the Natural Orders of Plants' (2 vols. fol. coloured plates, 1849; 2nd edit. 2 vols. 8vo, 1888).

The second Richard Twining's younger son, WILLIAM TWINING (1818-1848), educated at Rugby under Arnold, and at Balliol College, Oxford, studied at St. Bartholomew's Hospital, and practised as a physician. He published 'Some Account of Cretinism and the Instructions for its Cure,' 1848, and was instrumental in introducing the Abendberg system of idiot asylums into England.

The first Richard Twining's second son, THOMAS TWINING (1776-1861), born on 27 Jan. 1776, entered the Bengal service of the East India Company in 1792, was employed in the finance department, became acting sub-accountant-general and commissioner of the court of requests, and afterwards resident at Santipore and then of Behar, where Twining-gunge preserves his memory. 'Travels in India and America a Hundred Years Ago,' published long afterwards in 1893, records his experiences and his views on 'the danger of interfering in the religious opinions of the natives of India,' were printed in four 'Letters,' 1795-1803. He was twice married, and died at Twickenham on 25 Dec. 1861. His son THOMAS TWINING (1806-1896) was an authority on technical education, upon which he published a volume in 1874, besides lectures and reports; he also served on various committees, chiefly in connection with the Society of Arts. Part of his collection of technical drawings and models is now in the South Konsington Museum; but his own technical museum at Twickenham was burnt down in 1871. He died at Twickenham on 16 Feb. 1895.

[Selections from Papers of the Twining Family, ed. Richard Twining, 1887; Recreations and Studies of a Country Clergyman of the Eighteenth Century, ed. Richard Twining, 1882, Some Facts in the History of the Twining Family, by the Rev. W. H. G. Twining and Louisa Twining, for private circulation, 1892, revised edit., 1896, supplement by Louisa Twining, 1893, and pt. iii. 1896, by the same; Gent. Mag. 1824; private information.] S. L. P.

TWINING, THOMAS (1735-1801), translator of Aristotle's 'Poetics,' eldest son of Daniel Twining, tea dealer, by his wife, Ann March, and half-brother of Richard Twining [q. v.], was born at Dial House, Twickenham, on 8 Jan. 1734-5. He was educated first at a small school at Twickenham, and intended for his father's business; but, on his showing great aptitude for scholarship and none for the counting-house, he was sent to the Rev. Palmer Smythies at the grammar school, Colchester (where his name appears in the register for 1754), to be prepared for the university. He was entered at Sidney-Sussex College, Cambridge, in 1755, and in the following year obtained a foundation scholarship, and on 22 Dec. 1760 a fellowship. He graduated B.A. in 1760, and proceeded M.A. in 1768. Having taken holy orders, he settled in 1761 at the parsonage of Fordham. He was also presented to the living of White Netley in 1768, and to that of St. Mary's, Colchester, in 1788, by the bishop of London; but he continued to pass a quiet studious life between Fordham and Colchester until 1790, when he removed to the rectory at Colchester, in which he died on 6 Aug. 1804. In 1764 he married Elizabeth, daughter of Palmer Smythies, his former schoolmaster. She died in 1796; there were no children.

At Cambridge he had already shown remarkable attainments as a classical scholar and critic, and had also evinced science and talent as a musician. These two tastes filled his tranquil life. His only published work was the well-known translation of Aristotle's 'Poetics,' or, as he entitled it, 'Treatise on Poetry,' with critical notes, and dissertations on poetical and musical imitation (London, 4to, 1789; 2nd edit., edited by his nephew, the Rev. Daniel Twining, 2 vols. 8vo, 1812; the translation only reprinted in Cassell's 'National Library,' ed. Henry Morley, 1894). The work was warmly appreciated by scholars like Lloyne and by Samuel Parr [q. v.], who in 1777-8 was among his Colchester friends, and who wrote in 1790 that Twining was 'one of the best scholars now living, and one of the best men that ever lived.' Parr wrote Twining's epitaph in St. Mary's Church, Colchester, and in a letter dated 1816 said of him that 'no critic of his day excelled him; he understood Greek and Latin, and he wrote perfect English.' Parr's eulogy of Twining's letters, that he possessed 'a talent for epistolary writing certainly not surpassed by any of his contemporaries—wit, sagacity, learning, languages ancient and modern, the best principles of criticism, and the most exquisite feelings of taste, all united their various force and beauty,' is borne out by the correspondence published by his grandnephew, Mr. Richard Twining, with the title of 'Recreations and Studies of a Country Clergyman of the Eighteenth Century' (London, 1882), and in the sequel, entitled 'Selections from the Papers of the Twining Family' (London, 1887). Most of them were written to his brother Richard, but some of the most original and characteristic were addressed to Charles Burney [q. v.], in whose 'History of Music' Twining took a keen interest, and to which he contributed the results of his own critical researches. Music was the passion of his life, and he was at the same time a master of its science and history, and a good performer on the violin, organ harpsichord, and the 'new piano-forte.' He was also an accomplished linguist, and spoke and wrote French and Italian almost as well as his native tongue. His varied excellences and tastes stand admirably revealed in his correspondence. Besides his Aristotle, his only other publications were three sermons.

[Mém. by his brother Richard Twining prefixed to the Recreations and Studies of a Country Clergyman, 1882; information from Mr. J. H. Round; authorities under TWINING, RICHARD] S. L. P.

TWINING, WILLIAM (1790-1885), army surgeon, was the son of the Rev. William Twining, and was born in 1790 in Nova Scotia, whither his grandfather, the Rev. Griffith Twining of Olarbeston, Pembrokeshire, an offshoot of the Twinings of Parshore, went as a missionary in 1770. William Twining studied at Guy's Hospital in 1808 under Sir Astley Cooper, attended the anatomical classes of Joshua Brookes, who appointed him his demonstrator, became a fellow of the Royal College of Surgeons, and in 1810 went to Portugal as hospital assistant in Wellington's army, and served throughout the Peninsular war. In March 1814 he was promoted to be assistant surgeon on Lord Hill's staff, entered Parie with the allies, and was afterwards present at Waterloo. After the war he remained attached to Lord Hill until 1817, when he was stationed at Portsmouth. In 1819 he was at the hospital at Ohatham, and for a short time staff assistant at the cavalry dépôt at Maidstone. Tiring of garrison duty, he accepted an offer from Sir Edward Paget [q. v.], who had been appointed governor of Ceylon, of the post of personal surgeon, joined him in Ceylon in 1821, and accompanied him when appointed commander-in-chief of the Indian army to Bengal and the provinces. In 1824 he entered the East India Company's service, by Paget's influence, as assistant surgeon on the Bengal establishment, not resigning his king's commission, however, till 1830. After leaving Paget's staff he was appointed senior permanent assistant at the general hospital at Calcutta, a post which he held till his death, combining his hospital duties with the offices of surgeon to the gaol and to the Upper Orphan School, Kidderpore, and with a large private practice. He was also an active member of the Medical and Physical Society, in which he succeeded Dr. John Adams as secretary in 1830, and to which he contributed a number of important papers. In 1828 he printed a work on 'Diseases of the Spleen, particularly . . . in Bengal,' followed by a treatise on cholera (published in London in 1833); and in 1832 appeared his great work, 'Clinical Illustrations of the more important Diseases of Bengal,' the most valuable contribution to the scientific knowledge of Indian diseases so far published. The Indian government subsidised its expenses, and a second and enlarged edition was brought out in 1835. He died at Calcutta on 25 Aug. 1835. In 1817 he was married to Miss Montgomery. His only child was married to Frederick Oesve, C.B.

[Bengal Obituary, 1848; Facts in the History of the Twining Family, Supplement, 1893.]

S. L.-P.

TWISDEN. [See TWISDEN.]

TWISLETON, EDWARD TURNER BOYD (1809-1874), politician, born at Ceylon on 24 May 1809, was youngest son of Thomas James Twisleton (1770-1824), archdeacon of Colombo, by his second wife, Anna, daughter and coheir of Benjamin Aehl of Bath; she died on 11 Sept. 1847, leaving four children (Genl. Mag. March 1825, pp. 275-6). Thomas Twisleton, baron Saye and Sele, was his grandfather. Edward matriculated from Oriel College, Oxford, on 14 Feb. 1826, was a scholar and exhibitioner of Trinity College 1826-30, graduated B.A.

1829, taking first-class honours in classics, M.A. 1834, and was a fellow of Balliol College 1830-8. Entering Lincoln's Inn as a student in 1831, he was called to the bar at the Inner Temple on 30 Jan. 1835, and soon obtained employment on several government commissions. He was an assistant poor-law commissioner in 1839. In 1843 he was appointed a commissioner to inquire into the Scottish poor laws, and on 5 Nov. 1845 he was nominated chief commissioner of the poor laws in Ireland, a post which he held until 1849. In 1855 he was placed on the Oxford University commission, and in 1861 became a member of the commission of inquiry into English public schools. From 1862 to 1870 he was a civil service commissioner, when he retired from the public service, having probably served on more commissions than any other man of his time. His elder brother having succeeded to the barony of Saye and Sele on 13 March 1847, Twisleton in the following year was raised to the rank of a baron's son by a royal warrant. On 29 April 1859 he unsuccessfully contested the parliamentary borough of Cambridgeshire. He was elected a fellow of the university of London in 1862, and an honorary student of Christ Church, Oxford, in 1869. Interesting himself in the controversy respecting the identity of Junius, he employed Charles Oshott [q. v.], the handwriting expert, to report on the Junian manuscripts at the British Museum. He came to the conclusion that Philip Francis was the author of the letters, and in 1871 he published Charles Oshott's 'Handwriting of Junius professionally investigated,' 1871, to which he furnished a preface and collateral evidence in support of the claims of Francis. Twisleton resided at 3 Rutland Gate, Hyde Park, London, but died at Boulogne-sur-Mer on 5 Oct. 1874, having married, on 19 May 1852, Ellen, daughter of Edward Dwight, member for the province of Massachusetts. She died on 17 May 1862, apparently without issue.

Twisleton was the author of a work entitled 'The Tongue not Essential to Speech, with Illustrations of the Power of Speech in the African Confessors,' 1873. To 'Evidences as to the Religious Working of the Mission Schools in the State of Massachusetts,' 1854, he contributed a preface.

[Men of the Time, 1872, p. 927; Illustr. London News, 17 Oct. 1874 p. 379, 5 Dec. p. 647; Law Times, October 1874, p. 439; Times, 10 Oct. 1874, 4 Dec.] G. O. B.

TWISS, FRANCIS (1760-1827), compiler, born in 1760, the son of an English merchant residing in Holland, was descended from Richard Twiss, a younger son of the family of Twiss resident about 1680 at Kiltiernan, co. Kerry (BURN, Landed Gentry). Richard Twiss [q. v.] was his brother. He is said to have been contemporary at Pembroke College, Cambridge, with William Pitt as a student under Tomline, but his name does not appear in the printed list of graduates of that university. 'A hopeless passion for Mrs. Siddons' is believed to have been once nourished by him, but he married on 1 May 1786 her sister, Frances (1750-1822), usually called Fanny Kemble, second daughter of Roger Kemble [q. v.] Upon her marriage she retired from the stage, where her efforts as an actress had not been crowned with success. George Steevens [q. v.], the Shakespearean commentator, had championed her acting in the press, and wished to marry her, but the family deprecated the alliance (FRISWELL, The Kembles, i. 227-32).

Mrs. Twiss, a lovely woman, of great sweetness of character, from 1807 kept a fashionable girls' school at 21 Camden Place, Bath, and was assisted in the management by her husband and their three daughters. He is described by Mrs. F. A. Kemble as a 'grim-visaged, gaunt-figured, kind-hearted gentleman and profound scholar.' A lively picture of husband and wife is given by George Harding (NOTTAGE, Illustrations of Lit. iii. 37-8). 'She was big as a house, affected in manner and with measured voice, but very good-natured. He was very thin, stooping, and ghastly pale; takes 'absolute clouds of sun!' quaint in his phrases, 'very dogmatical and spoilt as an original.'

Twiss died at Cheltenham on 28 April 1827, aged 68. His wife had predeceased him, at Bath, on 1 Oct. 1822. Their oldest son was Horace Twiss [q. v.]; another son, John Twiss, became a major-general in the army on 5 Jan. 1804, and was governor of the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich.

Twiss published in two volumes in 1805, 'A complete verbal Index to the Plays of Shakspeare, adapted to all the editions,' with a dedication to John Philip Kemble. It was a work of immense labour, but as it gives the word only and not the passage in which it occurs, his labours have been superseded by later concordances. Seven hundred and fifty copies were printed of it, and 542 of them were destroyed by fire in 1807.

A famous portrait of Mrs. Twiss, a half-length, was painted by Sir Joshua Reynolds in 1783, and exhibited at Burlington House in 1800. It was sold by Christie & Manson among the pictures belonging to the Right Hon. G. A. F. Cavendish-Bentinck in July 1891 for 2,640 guineas. It was engraved by J. Jones (ROBERTS, Christie's, ii. 170). Another admirable oil portrait of her, the work of Opie, but 'showing the influence of Sir Thomas Lawrence,' belongs to Mr. Quintin Twiss, who also possesses miniatures of Francis Twiss and his wife.

[Gent. Mag. 1822 ii. 381, 1827 i. 476; Bowden's Mrs. Siddons, ii. 92-103; Bowden's J. P. Kemble, i. 328; Campbell's Mrs. Siddons, i. 15; F. A. Kemble's Records of a Girlhood, i. 20-26; Leslie and Taylor's Sir Joshua Reynolds, ii. 426-40; Rogers's Opie and his Works, p. 171; information from Mrs. Quintin W. F. Twiss.]
W. P. O.

TWISS, HORACE (1787-1849), wit and politician, was the eldest son of Francis Twiss [q. v.] He was born, probably at Bath, in 1787, was admitted as a student at the Inner Temple in 1806, and was called to the bar on 28 June 1811. He inherited the love of his mother's family for the stage. His aunt, Mrs. Siddons, recited at her practical farewell of the stage on 29 June 1813 an address which he had written for her; he assisted when she gave her 'readings from Shakspeare' (BOWDEN, Mrs. Siddons, ii. 383), and he was one of the executors of her will. Several family letters from her to Twiss are now in the possession of Mr. Quintin Twiss. A satirical poem, called 'St. Stephen's Chapel, by Horatius,' which was published in 1807, is sometimes attributed to him, and he was known when a young man as a contributor of squibs and jeux d'esprit to the papers, especially to the 'Morning Chronicle.' It was said at a later date that his rise at the bar had been retarded by his social, literary, and political celebrity.

Twiss went the Oxford circuit, and rose to be one of its leaders. He afterwards attached himself to the courts of equity, and in 1827 he became king's counsel. In 1837 he was reader of his inn, and in 1838 he was its treasurer. Political life possessed great attractions for him, and in 1820 he was returned to parliament, through the interest of Lord Clarendon, for the borough of Wootton-Basset in Wiltshire. He sat for it through two parliaments lasting from 1820 to 1830, and from 1830 to the dissolution in April 1831 he represented the borough of Newport in the Isle of Wight. Lord Campbell had made his acquaintance in 1804 at a famous debating society which met at the Crown and Rolls in Chancery Lane. He was 'the impersonation of a debating society rhetorician. . . . When he got into the House of Commons, though in exhaustively fluent, his manner certainly was very flippant, facetious, and unbusinesslike' (HARDCASTLE, Lord Campbell, i. 143). His speech on the proposed removal of the disabilities of Roman Catholics (23 March 1821) was, however, greatly applauded, and he subsequently addressed the house on several legal topics, particularly on those affecting the court of chancery. In 1826 he was appointed by the administration of Lord Liverpool to the posts of counsel to the admiralty and judge-advocate of the fleet; and in the government of the Duke of Wellington from 1828 to 1830 he held the position of under-secretary of war and the colonies. On the introduction of the Reform Bill (1 March 1831) he made a vehement speech against it. It meant the loss of his seat, and Macaulay records that when the measure passed its second reading 'the face of Twiss was as the face of a damned soul' (TREVILLYAN, Macaulay, i. 208).

From 1831 to 1835 Twiss was out of parliament, but at the general election in the latter year he was returned as the second member for the borough of Bridport in Dorset, polling 207 votes against 199 recorded for John, first lord Romilly [q. v.]. He sat for Bridport until the dissolution of parliament, and he is said to have during that period piloted through the House of Commons Lyndhurst's bill for making void marriage with a deceased wife's sister. At the general election of 1837 he was badly beaten in the contest for the representation of Nottingham, and in 1841 he was defeated at Bury St. Edmunds.

During those years, while Twiss was out of parliament and out of office, he utilised his influence with the 'Times,' he originated the summary of the debates in parliament, and occasionally wrote leaders. In October 1844 Lord Granville Charles Henry Somerset, the chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, made him vice-chancellor of the duchy, and he enjoyed that lucrative post until his death. His house was at all times open for hospitality to persons of widely different positions and talents, and his jester ran through the social life of London. He possessed a rich fund of humour, and sang 'with great spirit and expression.' A dinner given by him 'in a borrowed room' in Chancery Lane in June 1819 is described by Tom Moore (Memoirs, ii. 320). At one time he lived in Serle Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields; about 1830 he dwelt at 5 Park Place, St. James's. At the time of his death he lived in Grafton Street.

Twiss died from heart disease very suddenly while speaking at a meeting of the Rock Assurance Society at Radley's Hotel, Bridge Street, Blackfriars, on 4 May 1849, aged 62, and was buried in the Temple church. He was twice married. First, he married, at Bath, on 2 Aug. 1817, Anne Lawience, only daughter of Colonel Serle of Montagu Place, London. She had been a pupil at his mother's school at Bath, and was the smallest woman that Mrs. Frances Anne Kemble ever saw. She was probably the Mrs. Twiss who died at Cadogan Place on 20 Feb. 1827. Twiss married, secondly, in 1832, Annie, daughter of the Rev. Alexander Sterky (a Swiss minister and reader to the Princess Charlotte), and widow of Charles Greenwood, a Russian merchant. Twiss's only child by his first marriage, Fanny Horatia Serle Twiss (b. 1818, d. 22 Jan. 1874), married, first, Francis Bacon (d. 1840), and, secondly, John Thaddeus Delane [q. v.], editor of the 'Times.' Twiss's only son by his second wife, Mr. Quintin William Francis Twiss, is a clerk in the treasury.

The best known work of Twiss is his 'Public and Private Life of Lord Eldon,' [June] 1844, 8 vols. two thousand copies. A second edition of two thousand copies came out in August of that year, and a third edition in two volumes was published in 1846. In that year Mr. W. E. Surtees published 'A Sketch of the Lives of Lords Stowell and Eldon,' in which he embodied some corrections of Twiss. His other works were: 2. 'Influence of Prerogative,' 1812. 3. 'A Selection of Scotch Melodies,' by H. R. Bishop, Words by Twiss, 1814. 4. 'Posthumous Parodies of the Poets' [anon.], 1812; very sprightly, the best perhaps being that of Milton. 5. 'The Carib Chief: a Tragedy in five acts,' 1819 (3rd ed. 1819), dedicated to the Earl of Clarendon; the energetic action of Keam secured 'an unprecedented success' for it. 6. 'An Inquiry into the Means of consolidating and digesting the Laws of England,' 1825; Crofton Uniacke and John James Park published tracts referring to this inquiry. 7. 'Conservative Reform,' 1832.

[Gent. Mag. 1827 i. 283, 1849 i. 649-52; F. A. Kemble's Records of Girlhood, i. 141-3, ii. 263; Masters of Bench of Inner Temple, p. 98; Genest's English Stage, viii. 690-1.]

W. F. G.

TWISS, RICHARD (1747-1821), miscellaneous writer, born at Rotterdam on 26 April 1747, was the son of an English merchant residing in Holland. Francis Twiss [q. v.] was his younger brother. Having an ample fortune, he devoted himself to travelling, and visited Scotland. He afterwards went on the continent, and journeyed through Holland, Belgium, France, Switzerland, Italy, Germany, and Bohemia till 1770, when he returned to England. In 1772 he went to Spain and Portugal, returning the following year. Of this journey he published an account, entitled 'Travels through Portugal and Spain in 1772 and 1773,' London, 1775, 4to; the volume contains a fine print of 'Our Lady of the Fish,' drawn by Cypriani and engraved by Bartolozzi, and was pronounced by Dr. Johnson 'as good as the first book of travels you will take up.' The work appeared the same year in 12mo in Dublin, and French and German editions were issued the following year. In 1775 he visited Ireland, and then wrote his 'Tour in Ireland in 1775,' London, 1776, 8vo, of which there were several Irish editions. In the appendix he states he had taken sixteen sea voyages and travelled altogether about twenty-seven thousand miles. This book was very unpopular in Ireland. It provoked 'An Heroic Epistle' from Donna Teresa Pinna y Ruiz of Murcia, a lady whose acquaintance he formed when in that town, humorously complaining in the tilted verse then fashionable that he had deserted his Pinna for Iibernia. Twiss published the lines with explanatory notes, and responded in similar strain with 'An Heroic Answer from R. Twiss, esq., to Donna Teresa,' Dublin, 1776, 12mo.

He subsequently devoted himself to literature and fine arts and to speculations in endeavouring to manufacture paper out of straw, whereby he seriously impaired his fortune. He, however, revisited France during the revolution, the account of which appeared as 'A Trip to Paris in July and August 1792,' London, 1793, 8vo, which was also issued in two vols. 12mo in Dublin.

Twiss was elected a fellow of the Royal Society in 1774, but withdrew from it in 1794. He died in Somers Town on 5 March 1821.

In addition to the works already named, he wrote two volumes of miscellaneous notes on 'Chess,' published anonymously, London, 1787-89, 8vo; and was author of 'Miscellanies,' London, 1805, 2 vols. 8vo.

[English Cyclop.; Gent. Mag. 1821, i. 284; Georgian Era, iii. 465; Annual Biogr. and Obituary, 1823, pp. 446-50; J. G. Algor's Englishmen in the French Revolution, pp. 120-30; information kindly supplied by R. Harrison, esq., assist. sec. Roy. Soc.; Brit. Mus. Cat.]

B. B. W.

TWISS, SIR TRAVERS (1809-1897) civilian, oldest son of the Rev. Robert Twiss by his wife, Fanny Walker, was born in Gloucester Place, Marylebone, on 19 March 1809. From his mother, Anne Travers, Robert Twiss inherited an estate at Holesley, Flint. He died unbeneficed at his town residence, 35 Hamilton Terrace, on 23 Nov. 1857.

Travers matriculated on 5 April 1820 from University College, Oxford, where he gained a scholarship next year. He graduated B.A. (first class in mathematics, second class in classics) in 1830, M.A. in 1832, B.C.L. by commutation in 1835, and D.C.L. in 1841. From 1830 until his marriage in 1863 he was a fellow of University College, and he acted as bursar in 1835, dean in 1837, and tutor from 1836 to 1843. In 1864 he was elected an honorary fellow. He thrice served—a very unusual distinction—the offices of public examiner in both the arts schools, in litteris humanioribus in 1835 and the two following years, and in disciplinis mathematicis 1838-1840. Twiss was one of the few Oxford men of his day who possessed a competent knowledge of German, and his 'Epitome of Niebuhr's History of Rome' (1836, 2 vols. 8vo) helped to redeem the university from the reproach of obscurantism. A dissertation by him 'On the Amphitheatre of Pola in Istria' appeared in the transactions of the Ashmolean Society in 1836. He condensed the principal results of the Niebuhrian criticism in an annotated edition of Livy—'Livii Patavini Historiarum Libri . . . annotationes Niebuhrii, Wachsmuthii, et suas addidit Travers Twiss,' Oxford, 1840-1, 4 vols. 8vo.

Meanwhile Twiss was devoting himself to a study of law, political economy, and international politics. On 19 Feb. 1835, he was admitted a student at Lincoln's Inn, where he was called to the bar on 28 Jan. 1840, and elected a benchor on 19 Jan. 1858. On 2 Nov. 1841 he was admitted a member of the college of advocates. In succession to John Herman Morivalle [q. v.] he held at Oxford for the quinquennial term 1842-7 the Drummond chair of political economy. His contributions to economic science were merely perfunctory, a few professorial lectures: 'On Money,' 'On Machinery' (two); and 'On Certain Torts of a Thriving Population' (four), Oxford, 1843-5. The bent of his mind, concrete, cautious, inductive, was indeed entirely alien to the Ricardian dogmatism then in vogue, while he lacked the originative faculty necessary for striking out a path for himself. His concluding course, however, entitled 'View of the Progress of Political Economy in Europe since the Sixteenth Century' (London, 1847, 8vo), is not without historic value.

It was on questions of international law that he was gradually concentrating his attention. In 1852 he was elected to the chair of international law at King's College, London, and held it until 1855. In that year he succeeded Joseph Phillimore [q. v.] at Oxford in the regius professorship of civil law. That professorship he retained until 1870. His work as regius professor bore fruit in 'Two Introductory Lectures on the Science of International Law' (London, 1856, 8vo) and 'The Law of Nations considered as Independent Political Communities,' a systematic treatise on the entire science (Oxford, 1861-3, 2 vols. 8vo; 2nd edit. 1875; new edit. revised and enlarged, vol. i. only, 1884). An early member of the Social Science Association, he presided in 1862 over the department of international law, and afterwards served on the standing committee for the same subject.

Notwithstanding the wealth of his academic distinctions, few men had less of the academic spirit than Twiss. Keenly alive to the problems of the hour, he issued in 1846 'The Oregon Question examined with respect to Facts and the Law of Nations.' An American issue of the same date was entitled 'The Oregon Territory: its History and Discovery.' In 1848 Twiss published 'The Relations of the Duchies of Schleswig and Holstein to the Crown of Denmark and the German Confederation,' London, 1848, 8vo (German translation among the 'Beiträge zur Schleswig-Holsteinischen Frage,' Leipzig, 1849, 8vo). 'Hungary: its Constitution and its Catastrophe,' followed in 1850, and on the occasion of the creation of the Roman catholic bishoprics in England in 1851, Twiss wrote 'The Letters Apostolic of the Pope Pius IX considered with reference to the Law of England and the Law of Europe,' London, 1851, 8vo [see BOWYER, SIR GEORGE, 1811-1883]. He was selected by government on 20 Nov. 1850 as one of the commissioners for the delimitation of the frontier between New Brunswick and Canada (Parl. Pap. 1851, c. 1894). He was also a member of the royal commission appointed on 19 Sept. 1853 to inquire into the management and government of Maynooth College (ib. 1854-6, c. 1890), and of several subsequent royal commissions—viz. that of 22 March 1865 for the comparison of the various marriage laws in force throughout the queen's dominions, that of 8 June 1867 on rituals and rubrics, and those of 30 Jan. 1867 and 21 May 1868 on the laws of neutrality, naturalisation, and allegiance (ib. 1867 c. 3951, 1867-8 cc. 4016, 4027, 4057).

Meanwhile Twiss had secured much practices in the ecclesiastical courts. He was appointed in June 1849 commissary-general of the city and diocese; and in March 1852, in succession to Sir John Dodson [q. v.], vicar-general of the province of Canterbury and commissary of the archdeaconry of Suffolk. On the transference (1867) of the testamentary and matrimonial jurisdiction from the ecclesiastical courts to the new civil court of probate and divorce, he took silk (January 1858). On 17 July 1858 he succeeded Dr. Stephen Lushington [q. v.] as chancellor of the diocese of London. He practised with no less distinction in the admiralty court, was engaged in most of the prize cases which arose from captures made during the Crimean war, and was appointed in September 1862 to the office of admiralty advocate-general in succession to Sir Robert Joseph Phillimore [q. v.], whom he again succeeded as queen's advocate-general on 23 Aug. 1867. He was knighted on 4 Nov. following.

This brilliant professional career was suddenly arrested. Twiss had married at Dresden, on 29 Aug. 1862, Marie Pharialdé Rosalind Van Lynseele, who was stated to be the orphan daughter of a general officer of the Polish army. She was understood to have moved in good society both at Dresden and at Brussels, and was twice presented at the court of St. James's—once in 1863 and again in 1869. Her married life was irreproachable. But in March 1872 Twiss and his wife prosecuted in the Southwark police-court for malicious libel, with intent to extort, a solicitor who had circulated statements imputing immorality to Lady Twiss before her marriage. The ordeal of cross-examination proved to be too severe for Lady Twiss's powers of endurance, and her sudden departure from London caused the collapse of the prosecution (14 March 1872). Twiss thereupon resigned his offices (21 March) and ceased to practise. On 19 April the lord chamberlain announced in the 'London Gazette' that Lady Twiss's presentation at court had been cancelled.

Thenceforth Twiss devoted himself exclusively to juridical science and scholarship. He had already edited (Rolls Ser. 1871, 8vo) 'The Black Book of the Admiralty,' a reconstruction from various manuscript fragments of the substance of that unique source of mediæval maritime law then supposed to be irretrievably lost, of which his researches led to the recovery. In three subsequent volumes (1873, 1874, 1876) he collected as appendices under the same title the original texts of the Domesday of Ipswich, the Customaries of Oleron and Rouen, the Charter of Oleron, the Consulate of the Sea, the Laws of Amalfi and Gotland (with the summary of the latter known as the Laws of Wisby), the Codes of the Teutonic Order of Livonia, of Danzig, Lubeck, Flanders, Valencia, the Kingdom of Jerusalem, and Trani, the whole forming a singularly rich mine of material for the legal archaeologist.

On the other hand in the recension of Bracton, contributed by him to the same series, 'Henricus de Bracton de Legibus et Consuetudinibus Anglie,' 1878-88, 6 vols. 8vo, he essayed a task to which his patience, if not his powers, proved unequal; and a satisfactory text of that sadly corrupted and interpolated legal classic remains a desideratum (cf. Vinogradoff on 'The Text of Bracton' in Law Quarterly Review, i. 180 et seq.) An edition by him of the earlier treatise of Ranulf de Glanville [q. v.] was sanctioned in 1884, and announced as in the press in 1890, but has not appeared.

Twiss assisted at the inauguration at Brussels on 10 Oct. 1873 of the Association for the Reform and Codification of the Law of Nations, of which he was vice-president for England, and was for many years one of the most active members. From 1874 he was also a member of the cognate Institute of International Law founded at Ghent on 8 Sept. 1873, and acted vice-president in 1878, 1879, and 1885. He assisted the king of the Belgians in shaping the constitution of the Independent Congo State, and as counsel extraordinary to the British embassy at Berlin took part in the labours of the congress held in that capital, November 1884 to February 1885, at which the new polity received European recognition. Uniquely thus attaches to the chapter on this unusually important congress which concludes the first volume of the French version (revised by Professor Rivier of Brussels) of Twiss's great treatise on 'The Law of Nations' ('Le Droit des Gens ou des Nations,' Paris, vol. i. 1887, vol. ii. 1889, 8vo).

Twiss died on 14 Jan. 1897 at his residence, 6 Whittingstall Road, Fulham; his remains were interred in Fulham cemetery on 20 Jan. As a jurist his fame chiefly rests on the 'Law of Nations,' which, in the French edition, is a standard work. Though an acute and ingenious he was hardly an original thinker; and his scholarship was as inaccurate as his style was diffuse.

Among Twiss's uncollected dissertations may be specified the following: 1. 'La Neutralisation du Canal de Suez' ('Rev. de Droit Internat.' tome vii. 682 et seq.) 2. 'The Extraterritoriality of Public Ships of War in Foreign Waters' ('Law Mag. and Rev.' 1876). 3. 'The Applicability of the European Law of Nations to African Slave States' (ib. May 1876). 4. 'The Criminal Jurisdiction of the Admiralty: the Case of the Franconia' (ib. February 1877). 5. 'On the International Jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court in Civil Matters' (ib. May 1877). 6. 'The Doctrine of Continuous Voyages as applied to Contraband of War and Blockade' (ib. November 1877); reprinted the same year in pamphlet form, London, 8vo. 7. 'Albericus Gentili on the Right of War' (ib. February 1878). 8. 'Collisions at Sea: a Scheme of International Tribunals' (ib. November 1878). 9. 'On the Treaty-making Power of the Crown: Le Parlement Belge' (ib. May 1879). 10. 'On Jurisprudence and the Amendment of the Law' (ib. November 1879). 11. 'The Alleged Discovery of the Remains of Columbus' ('Naut. Mag.' June 1879; reprinted the same year as 'Columbus: his Last Resting Place'). 12. 'Cyprus: its Medieval Jurisprudence and Modern Legislation' ('Law Mag. and Rev.' May 1880). 12. 'The Conflict of Marriage Laws' (ib. November 1882). 13. 'The Freedom of the Navigation of the Suez Canal' (ib. February 1883). 14. Leibnitz's Memoir upon Egypt (ib. May 1883). 15. 'An International Protectorate of the Congo River' (ib. November 1883). 16. 'De la Sécurité de la Navigation dans le Canal de Suez' ('Rev. de Droit Internat.' xiv. 672 et seq.) 17. 'La Libre Navigation du Congo' (ib. xv. 467 et seq. and 547 et seq., xvi. 237 et seq.) 18. 'Des Droits de Belligérants sur Mer depuis la Déclaration de Paris' (ib. xvi. 113 et seq.); also in English (pamphlet form) with title 'Belligerent Right on the High Seas since the Declaration of Paris,' London, 1884, 8vo. 19. 'Le Congrès de Vienne et la Conférence de Berlin' (ib. xvii. 201 et seq.) 20. 'Le Canal Maritime de Suez et la Commission Internationale de Paris' (ib. xvii. 615 et seq.) 21. 'On International Conventions for the Neutralisation of Territory and their Application to the Suez Canal' ('Law Mag. and Law Rev.' November 1887). 22. 'La Jurisdiction Consulaire dans les Pays de l'Orient et spécialement au Japon' ('Rev. de Droit Internat.' xxv. 213 et seq.) 23. 'The Twelfth Century, the Age of Scientific Judicial Procedure. i. Magister Ricardus Anglicus, the Pioneer of Scientific Judicial Procedure in the Twelfth Century. ii. The Pseudo-Ulpian (Ulpianus de Ebdendo). The Latter Days of Ricardus Anglicus' ('Law Mag. and Law Rev.' May 1894). 24. 'Ricardus Anglicus and the Thirteenth Century, the Age of Scientific Law Amendment' (ib. November 1894). 25. Review of Professors Pallock and Maitland's 'History of English Law before the Time of Edward I' (ib. November 1895). 26. 'An International Arbitration in the Middle Ages' (ib. November

Twiss also contributed to the 'Encyclopædia Britannica' (9th edit.) the articles Archbishop, Archdeacon, Bishop, Convocation, and Sea Laws.

[Foster's Alumni Oxon., Men at the Bar, and Knightage; St. George's, Hanover Square, Marr. Reg. (Harl. Soc.) p. 320; Lincoln's Inn Adm. Book and Reg.; Jurist, v. 985; Solicitors' Journal, xvi. 391; Stanley's Congo and the Founding of its Free State, i. 380; Men and Women of the Time; Times, 1-14 March 1872, 16 Jan. 1897; Law Times, 23 Jan. 1897; Rev. de Droit Internat. xxix. 96; Tabl. Gén. de l'Inst. de Droit Internat. 1897; Annuaire de Droit Internat. 1897; Law Mag. and Rev. May 1877; Law Mag. and Law Rev. February 1897; Athenæum, 1874 p. 519, 1875 p. 418; Law Quarterly Rev. iii. 243; Notes of Cases in the Ecl. and Marit. Courts; Robertson's Ecl. Rep.; Spinks's Ecl. and Arlm. Rep.; Deane's Reports; Swabey's Reports; Swabsey and Tristram's Reports; Marit. Law Cases, 1860-71.] J. M. R.

TWISS, WILLIAM (1745-1827), general, colonial-commandant royal engineers, born in 1745, was appointed to the ordnance office at the Tower of London on 22 July 1780, and, leaving it on 21 May 1782, was appointed in July of that year to be overseer of the king's works at Gibraltar. On 19 Nov. 1783 he received a commission as practitioner engineer and ensign. He remained at Gibraltar until 1771, when, on promotion on 1 April to be sub-engineer and lieutenant, he returned to England and was employed on the defences of Portsmouth Dockyard. In 1776 he went with the army under Major-general John Burgoyne (1722-1792) [q. v.] to North America, arriving at Quebec early in June, and was appointed aide-de-camp to Major-general William Phillips [q. v.] He took part in the affair at the Three Rivers on 8 June, in the pursuit of the Americans up the St. Lawrence, and in the operations by which the enemy was driven out of Canada and compelled to take refuge in their fleet on Lake Champlain.

Twiss was next appointed by Sir Guy Carleton (afterwards first Lord Dorchester) [q. v.], the commander-in-chief in Canada, to be comptroller of works to superintend the construction of a fleet for Lake Champlain, with gunboats and batteaux to convey the army over the lake. The larger vessels had been sent from England, but it was found necessary to take them to pieces. It was also necessary to transport overland and drag up the rapid currents of St. Therese and St. John's a number of flat boats of great burden (one vessel weighing thirty tons), and over four hundred batteaux. With the assistance of Lieutenant (afterwards Admiral) John Schanck [q. v.] the arduous undertaking was completed in three months, and on 11 Oct. the British lake fleet partially engaged the enemy's fleet off the island of Valicour, and, following it the next day, gained a decisive victory. On the 15th Twiss disembarked with the army at Crown Point, the enemy evacuating it. He remained there until 3 Nov., reconnoitred Ticonderoga, and returned with the army to winter in Canada.

On Burgoyne's return from England with supreme command, in the spring of 1777, Twiss was appointed commanding engineer, and on 16 June left St. John's with the army which reoccupied Crown Point, and arrived before Ticonderoga on 2 July. He at once commenced siege-works, and having reconnoitred Sugar Hill, to the south-west of Ticonderoga fort, found that it entirely commanded the enemy's works, both of the fort itself and of Mount Independence, which had been very strongly fortified. On his advice a battery for heavy guns and eight-inch howitzers was constructed on the hill, and was ready to open fire, when the enemy, finding the place no longer tenable, decided to retreat before being completely invested, and Ticonderoga was evacuated on 5 July. Twiss took part in the action of Still Water, and in the various operations of the march to Saratoga in September and October, and was included in the convention of Saratoga on 16 Oct., becoming a prisoner of war, but was exchanged a few days later and returned to Ticonderoga.

In 1778 Twiss was sent by Major-general (Sir) Frederick Haldimand [q. v.] to Lake Ontario to form a naval establishment on the east side of the lake. On 18 Dec. of that year he was promoted to be engineer extraordinary and captain-lieutenant. In 1779 he designed new patterns of pickaxes and shovels for the use of the troops, and these were adopted by government in the following year. Twiss was employed in various parts of Canada as chief engineer until the peace in 1783, when he returned to England, and was again employed upon the Portsmouth defences. In 1785 he was appointed secretary to the board of land and sea officers ordered to report to the king upon the defences of the dockyards at Portsmouth and at Plymouth. On 24 March 1786 he was promoted to be captain in the royal engineers. He remained at Portsmouth for some years, constructing fortifications, particularly those of Fort Cumberland at the entrance of Langston Harbour.

In 1790 Twiss was given the command of the company of sappers and miners at Gosport. On 1 March 1794 he was promoted to be brevet major, and on 1 Juno of the same year to be lieutenant-colonel in the royal engineers. In this year he was a member of a committee on engineer field equipment, and expressed a preference for the stuffed gabion used at the siege of Valenciennes over other patterns of mantlets.

On 1 Jan. 1795 Twiss was appointed lieutenant-governor of the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich, in succession to Colonel Stehelin, and continued to hold the appointment for fifteen years. Its duties did not prevent his employment in other ways. He was commanding royal engineer of the southern military district, and between 1792 and 1803 reported upon and directed the reconstruction of the defences of the coasts of Kent and Sussex, and more particularly upon those at Dover, where Sir Thomas Hyde Page [q. v.] of the royal engineers carried out his instructions. In 1798 he was employed by government to report upon a project for a tunnel under the Thames at Gravesend, and so favourably was he impressed with the proposal that he joined the directorate of a company formed to carry it out. A shaft was sunk, and a good deal of money also, when the project was abandoned in 1802. In the spring of this year he was consulted as to the destruction of the sluice-gates and basin of the Bruges canal at Ostend; and his assistance in preparing the necessary instruments was warmly acknowledged by Major-general Eyre Coote in his despatch of 19 May 1798.

In September 1790, on the recommendation of the Marquis Cornwallis, Twiss went to Holland as commanding royal engineer of the Duke of York's army, and remained until the evacuation took place in November. On 1 Jan. 1800 Twiss was promoted to be colonel in the army.

In 1800 Twiss visited Jersey and Guernsey, and reported upon their defences. In 1802, in accordance with repeated representations made to the government by Cornwallis during his viceroyalty, that the advice of Twiss on the defence of Ireland would be of great benefit, Lord Othatham sent Twiss to make a tour through the country and report upon the subject. On 11 Feb. 1801 he was appointed a brigadier-general. In 1805 he was directed to carry into execution the system of detached forts and martello towers for the Kent and Sussex coasts, and a redoubt still existing on the coast near Dungeness was named, after him, Fort Twiss. He was further directed to report how far the same system of defence was applicable to the coasts of the eastern counties. These coast works were completed about 1800.

On 30 Oct. 1805 Twiss was promoted to be major-general. In this year he was a member of a committee which determined, by experiments conducted at Woolwich Warren, the best construction for traversing platforms for the heavy nature of ordnance. The form of platform recommended—with the centre of the traversing arc in the middle, front, or rear of the platform, as the situation might require—was approved and continued to be in principle the service pattern up to a comparatively recent date.

On 24 June 1809 Twiss became a colonel-commandant of the corps of royal engineers, and retired from active duty. In 1811 he was a member of a committee on the Chatham defences then in progress—Chatham Lines and Fort Pitt. Twiss was promoted to be lieutenant-general on 1 Jan. 1812, and general on 27 May 1825. He died at his residence, Hadden Grange, Bingley, Yorkshire, on 14 March 1827.

[Royal Engineers Records; Royal Military Calendar, vol. iii. 1820; War Office Records; Despatches; Annual Register, 1798; Correspondence of Charles, first Marquis Cornwallis, ed. Ross, 3 vols. 8vo, London, 1859; Cust's Annals of the Wars of the Eighteenth Century, vol. iii.; Stedman's History of the Origin, Progress, and Termination of the American War, 2 vols. 4to, London, 1794; History of the Campaign of 1799 in Holland, translated from the French, 8vo, London, 1801; Carmichael Smyth's Chronological Epitome of the Wars in the Low Countries.] R. H. V.

TWISSE, WILLIAM, D.D. (1678?-1646), puritan divine, was born at Spesshamland in the parish of Speen, near Newbury, about 1578. The family name is variously spelled Twysse, Twiss, Twyste, and Twist. His grandfather was a German, his father a clothier. Thomas Bilson [q. v.] was his uncle (KUNDALE). While at Winchester school where he was admitted, aged 12, in 1590 (KIRBY), he was startled into religious conviction by the apparition of a 'rakehell' schoolfellow uttering the words 'I am damned.' From Winchester he went as probationer fellow to New College, Oxford, in 1596, his eighteenth year (ib.), was admitted fellow 11 March 1598, graduated B.A. 14 Oct. 1600, M.A. 12 June 1604, and took orders. His reputation was that of an erudite student, equally remarkable for pains and penetration. Sir Henry Savils [q. v.] had his assistance in his projected edition of Bradwardine's 'De Causa Dei contra Pelagium' (published 1618), which Twiss, before 1613, had transcribed and annotated. His expository power was shown in his Thursday catechetical lectures in the college chapel.

To his plain sermons, delivered every Sunday 'in ecclesia parochiali Olivæ' (St. Al-date's), he drew large numbers of the university. He graduated B.D. on 9 July 1612.

Twisse's popularity was increased by his readiness on an unexpected occasion in 1613. A Hebrew teacher at Oxford, Joseph Barnatus, had ingratiated himself with Arthur Lake [q. v.], warden of New College, by offering to receive Christian baptism, to be administered on a Sunday at St. Mary's after a special sermon by Twisse. But on the Saturday 'honus Josephus clanculum se eubducit,' and, though dragged back to Oxford, declined baptism. Twisse preached a tactful sermon which saved the situation. Shortly afterwards he was made chaplain to Elizabeth, queen of Bohemia [q. v.], and attended her on her journey with her husband to Heidelberg (April-June 1613). Twisse evidently expected a long absence; for he disposed of his small patrimony (30*l.* a year), giving it in trust to his brother. But before he had been two months at Heidelberg he was recalled. On the presentation of his college he was instituted (13 Sept. 1613) to the rectory of Newton or Newington Longueville, Buckinghamshire. He proceeded to this degree of D.D. on 5 July 1614. His life for some years was that of a recluse scholar, studying hard, yet not neglecting his flock. On 22 March 1618-19 Nathaniel Giles had been instituted to the rectory of Newbury. The municipal authorities were anxious to secure Twisse, who accordingly exchanged with Giles, and was instituted to Newbury on 4 Oct. 1620. Further preferences he resolutely declined, refusing the provostship of Winchester, and rejecting a prebend in Winchester Cathedral, as lacking music for the singing and rhetoric for the preaching, and not skilled to stroke a cathedral heard canonically. He declined an invitation to a divinity chair at Franeker. He felt the pressure of his duties as age crept on, and was tempted by the offer of Robert Rich, second earl of Warwick [q. v.], to give him a better living (Benefield, Northamptonshire), with a less laborious cure. Before accepting it he saw Laud, with whom he had been intimate at Oxford, about the appointment of his successor, Newbury being a crown living. Laud promised to meet Twisse's requirements, adding that he would assure the king that Twisse was no puritan. He at once decided to stick to his post. His puritanism was not aggressive, and was chiefly doctrinal. He did not read the 'Declaration of Sports,' and protested against it with quiet firmness. It was a tribute to his commanding eminence as a theologian and to his moderate bearing that, at the king's desire, he was subjected to no episcopal censure. His bishop was John Davenant [q. v.], who certainly had no inclination to interfere with Twisse unless compelled.

As a controversialist Twisse was courteous and thorough, owing much of his strength to his accurate understanding of his opponent's position. Baxter well describes him as using a 'very smooth triumphant stile.' The defence of the puritan theology was congenial to him; and in an age of transition to positions more or less Arminian the acumen of Twisse was constantly exercised in maintaining the stricter view. No contemporary theologian gave him more trouble than Thomas Jackson (1579-1640) [q. v.]. He had less difficulty in dealing with the more sharply defined antagonism of Henry Mason [q. v.], Thomas Godwin, D.D. [q. v.], and John Goodwin [q. v.]. Men of his own school, like John Cotton of New England, found him a watchful critic, always armed to resist deviations in doctrine.

At the outset of the civil war Prince Rupert had hopes of engaging Twisse on the side of the king. His sympathies were with the cause of the parliament, but he thought the war would be fatal to the best interests of both parties. In ecclesiastical affairs he had a dread of revolutionary measures, and the policy of laying hands on the patrimony of the church he viewed as inimical to religion. He had been on the sub-committee in aid of the lords' accommodation scheme of March 1641. There is no reason for doubting that his own preference was always for the modified episcopacy then recommended. He was nominated to the Westminster assembly of divines in the original ordinance of June 1643, was unanimously elected prolocutor and preached at the formal opening of the assembly on 1 July, regretting in his sermon the absence of the royal assent, and hoping it might yet be obtained. He had very unwillingly accepted the post; indeed, his health was unequal to its demands. Robert Baillie, D.D. [q. v.], thought it a 'canny conveyance of these who guides most matters for their own interest to plant such a man of purpose in the chaire.' He describes him as 'very learned in the questions he has studied, and very good, beloved of all and highly esteemed; but merely bookish . . . among the unfittest of all the company for any action.' Baillie's keen ear detected that Twisse was not used to pray without book, adding, 'After the prayer he sits mute.' The minutes show that his part in the assembly was purely formal, and he owned himself 'unfit for such an employment that divers times do fall upon me' (3 Jan. 1644-5). It fell to Cornelius Burges, D.D. [q. v.], to supply, 'so farr as is decent, the proloquutor's place' (BAILLIN). On 1 April 1645 it was reported to the assembly that the prolocutor was 'very sick and in great straits.' He had received no profits from Newbury, and but a small stipend (1643-5) as one of three lecturers at St. Andrew's, Holborn. On 30 March 1645 he had fainted in the pulpit ('procumbit in pulverem,' KUNDALL), and henceforth kept his bed. Though a man of some estate—for his will (9 Sept. 1645; codicil 30 June 1646; provod 6 Aug. 1646) disposes of the manor of Ashmaston, Berkshire, and other property—the confusion of the times had deprived him of income. Parliament voted him 100*l.* (4 Dec. 1645), which does not seem to have been paid in full; on 28 June 1646 the assembly sent him 10*l.*, with the assurance 'that there hath been no money paid by any order of parliament to his use that hath been detained from him.'

Twisse died in Holborn on 20 July 1646, and on 24 July, with all the pomp of a public funeral, was buried in Westminster Abbey, 'in the south side of the church, near the upper end of the poor's table, next the vestry.' By royal mandate of 9 Sept. 1661 his remains, with others, were disinterred and thrown into a common pit in St. Margaret's churchyard, the site being in the sward between the north transept and the west end of the abbey. An oil painting of him, done in 1644, is in the vestry of St. Nicholas, Newbury. Bromley says his portrait, engraved by T. Trotter, is in the 'Non-conformist's Memorial,' but this is an error. He was twice married: first, before 1615, to a daughter of Robert Moor [q. v.]; secondly, to Frances, daughter of Barnabas Colnett of Combley, Isle of Wight. At the time of his death he was a widower with four sons and three daughters. His son William, born in 1616, was fellow of New College, Oxford (1636-60); his son Robert (d. 1674) published in 1665 a sermon preached at the New Church (now Christ Church), Westminster, 'on the anniversary of the martyrdom' of Charles I. Parliament voted 1000*l.* towards the support of his children, but the money does not seem to have been paid.

Twisse published: 1. 'A Discoverie of D. Jacksons Vanitie,' 1631, 4to. 2. 'Vindictio Gratia, Potestatis ac Providentia Dei,' Amsterdam, 1632, fol.; 1648, fol. 3. 'Dissertatio de Scientia Media,' Arnheim, 1639, fol. 4. 'Of the Morality of the Fourth Commandment,' 1641, 4to; with new title, 'The Christian Sabbath defended,' 1662, 4to. 5. 'A Brief Catechetical Exposition of Christian Doctrine,' 1645, 8vo. 6. 'A Treatise of Mr. Cotton's . . . concerning Predestination . . . with an Examination thereof,' 1646, 4to. Posthumous were: 7. 'Ad . . . Arminii Collationem . . . et . . . Corvini Defensionem . . . Animadversiones,' Amsterdam, 1649, fol. 8. 'The Doctrine of the Synod of Dort and Arles (sic) reduced to the Practise, with an Answer therunto' [1650], 4to. 9. 'The Doubting Conscience resolved,' 1652, 12mo. 10. 'The Riches of God's Love . . . consisted with . . . Reprobation,' Oxford, 1653, fol. 11. 'The Scriptures Sufficiency,' 1656, 12mo; commendatory epistle (29 April 1652) by Joseph Hall, bishop of Norwich. According to Kendall, he left some thirty unpublished treatises. His manuscripts, Wood says, were carefully kept by his son Robert till his death. His fifteen letters (2 Nov. 1620-2 July 1633) to Joseph Mead [q. v.] are printed in Mead's 'Works,' 1672, bk. iv. The collection of '(in)ilicini Twissi . . . Opera,' Amsterdam, 1652, fol., 2 vols., consists of Nos. 2, 3, and 7 above, bound together, with additional title-page.

[Twissi Vita et Victoria, by George Kendall (q. v.), appended to Far pro Tribunali, 1667, is the main authority; it is closely (not always carefully) followed in Clarke's Lives of Sundry Eminent Persons (1683, pp. 13 sq.), less closely by Brook (Lives of the Puritans, 1813, iii. 12 sq.), and by Chalmers (General Biographical Dictionary, 1816, xxx. 118 sq.). See also Wood's Athene Oxon. (Bliss), iii. 169 sq.; Wood's Pastii (Bliss), i. 285, 303, 348, 359; Foster's Alumni Oxon. 1892, iv. 1525; Fuller's Church History, 1655, xi. 199; Fuller's Worthies, 1662, 'Berkshire,' p. 96; Reliquiae Baxterianae, 1696, i. 73; Bromley's Catalogue of Engraved British Portraits, 1793, p. 91; History of Newbury, 1839, p. 106; Lipscomb's Buckingham, 1847, iv. 266; Mitchell and Struthers's Minutes of the Westminster Assembly, 1874, passim to p. 238; Ostor's Registers of Westminster Abbey, 1876, pp. 140, 151, 163; Money's Hist. of Newbury, 1887, pp. 503 sq.] A. G.

TWM SHON CATTI (1590-1620?), Welsh bard and genealogist. [See JONES THOMAS.]

TWYFORD, JOSIAH (1640-1729), potter, was born in 1640 at Shelton, near Stoke-on-Trent. About 1690 he was employed by John Philip Elers [q. v.], in his pottery works. Elers had settled at Bradwell Wood, near Burslem, shortly before, and had established a pottery there. His processes were carefully kept secret, persons of small intelligence being selected by him as assistants. His precautions, however, were unavailing, for his secrets were discovered independently by John Astbury [q. v.], who feigned idiocy, and by Twyford, who deceived Elers by showing entire indifference to every operation in which he assisted.

After mastering Elers's processes, Twyford commenced a manufactory of his own near Shelton Old Hall, the seat of the family of Elijah Fenton [q. v.], on the site of the present parish church of Shelton. He made red and white stone wares, and was one of the first to employ Bideford pipeclay in his work. An old porringer, inscribed 'Mr. Thomas Fenton,' which was presented to Thomas Fenton (a relative of Elijah Fenton) by Twyford, is still in the possession of Thomas Fenton of Stoke Lodge.

Twyford died in 1729, and was buried in the churchyard of the parish church of Stoke-upon-Trent. The Bath Street pottery in the neighbourhood is carried on by his descendant, Mr. Thomas William Twyford.

[Shaw's Staffordshire Potteries, 1829, pp. 119, 126, Jewitt's Life of Josiah Wedgwood, 1866, pp. 42, 95; Jewitt's Ceramic Art in Great Britain, 1883, pp. 487, 501, 505, 506; Chaffers's Marks and Monograms on Pottery and Porcelain, 1897, p. 693; Lloyd's Elijah Fenton, his Poetry and Friends, 1894, p. 109.] E. I. C.

TWYFORD, SIR NICHOLAS (d. 1390), lord mayor of London, belonged perhaps to the Twyfords of Derbyshire, which was frequently represented in parliament in the fourteenth century, first by John Twyford and then by Sir Robert Twyford (Official Returns, i. 48, 54, 57, 152, 177, 179, 182, 187, 208). Nicholas was brought up as a goldsmith in London, residing in the parish of St. John Zachary, Aldersgate ward, and afterwards became warden of the Goldsmiths' Company. He was the leading goldsmith in the city, and probably about 1360 was appointed goldsmith in ordinary to the king. On 26 Jan. 1368-9 he was one of those commissioned by Edward III to assay gold and silver (RYMER, Fœdera, Record ed. iii. 858). On 16 Jan. 1376-7 he was paid 2*l.* 10*s.* 'for engraving and making a seal ordered by the king for the lordship of Glamorgan and Morgannock lately belonging to Edward, lord la Despenser' (DEVON, Isis, p. 201). On 16 July 1378 he received the large sum of 22*l.* 17*s.* 4*d.* from Richard II for 'two drinking-cups and two silver owers' (ib. p. 211). Richard II and John of Gaunt bought some of their wedding and new year's gifts of plate and jewellery from him, and in 1384 he purchased a quantity of 'old and broken vessels of white silver' for 389*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.*

Twyford meanwhile was taking a prominent part in city politics; he was alderman of Coleman Street ward in 1376 (RILEY, Munimenta Gildhallie, iii. 424; Memorials, pp. 351, 400), and in 1378 was sheriff (Cal. Patent Rolls, 1377-81, pp. 140, 267). He belonged to John of Gaunt's party which was led by John Northampton [q. v.] in opposition to the court party led by Sir Nicholas Brembre [q. v.]; and in 1378, when Brembre was lord mayor, Twyford came into collision with him. Brembre had imprisoned a member of the Goldsmiths' Company and one of Twyford's suite for brawling in St. Paul's Churchyard during sermon time. Twyford resented this, with the result that he was himself for a short time imprisoned (RILEY, Memorials, pp. 415-17). In 1380 he was commissioner for building a tower on either side of the Thames. In 1381 Twyford was with Sir William Walworth [q. v.] when Wat Tyler was killed, and was on that occasion knighted by Richard II for his services (Collections of a London Citizen, p. 91; KNIGHTON, Chron. ii. 138; FABYAN, Chron. p. 531). In the same year he acquired two parts of the manor of Exning, Suffolk, about which and other property he was involved in various disputes in 1384 (Cal. Patent Rolls, 1381-5, pp. 58, 504, 579, 582, 596; Rot. Parl. iii. 136, 296, 399).

When Brembre sought re-election as lord mayor in 1384, Twyford was his chief opponent; party feeling ran high, and, in spite of extraordinary precautions, a disturbance broke out; Twyford's supporters were compelled to flee, and Brembre was elected (HARDEN, Polychron. ix. 50-1). On 12 Oct. 1388, however, Twyford was himself elected lord mayor with little opposition (ib. ix. 199; STOW, Survey, ed. Strype, bk. v. p. 115).

Twyford died probably in July 1390; by his will, dated 11 June 1390, he left his lands in Tottenham and 'Edelmeton,' Middlesex, to his wife Margery, and after her death to his kinsman John Twyford; he also bequeathed certain rents to the Goldsmiths' Company to keep his obit in the company's parish church of St. John Zachary in Maiden Lane (Calendar of Wills proved in the Hustling Court, ii. 283-4). He was buried in that church, where a monument was erected to himself and his wife, who died before 1402; the church was destroyed in the fire of 1666 (STOW, Survey, ed. Strype, bk. iii. pp. 96-7; NEWCOURT, Repertorium, i. 375). Twyford mentions, but does not name, his children in his will; a William Twyford was valet to Thomas, earl of Arundel, in 1418 (DEVON, Issues, p. 327).

[Authorities cited; Sharps's London and the Kingdom, i. 227, 239; Notes and Queries, 8th ser. ii. 166, 237, 411; Riley's Memorials, passim; Sir W. S. Priceman's Memorials of the Goldsmiths' Company, 2 vols. 1896, supplies such inadequate details from the records of the company that Twynford's name is not even mentioned.] A. F. P.

TWYNE, BRIAN (1579?-1644), Oxford antiquary, son of Thomas Twyne [q. v.] and his wife, Joanna Pumfrott, was born about 1579 at Lewes, whose father was in practice as a physician. Like his father, he was educated at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, being elected scholar on 13 Dec. 1594, and graduating B.A. on 23 July 1599 and M.A. on 9 July 1603. He was elected fellow in 1605, graduated B.D. on 25 June 1610, and became Greek lecturer at his college in 1614. On 15 March 1613-14 he was inducted to the vicarage of Ito in Sussex on the presentation of Richard Sackville, earl of Dorset [q. v.]; he performed his pastoral duties by deputy, and resided mainly at Oxford, though he spent some time at Lewes (HORSFIELD, Lewes, i. 220). According to Wood, he resigned his lectureship at Corpus about 1623 to avoid being involved in the dispute between the president, Thomas Anyan, and the fellows, fearing the possibility of his own expulsion (but cf. FOWLER, List. Corpus Christi, p. 155). From that time he devoted his whole energies to the collection of materials relating to the history and antiquities of Oxford.

Before 1608 Twyne became immersed in the controversy respecting the comparative antiquity of the universities of Oxford and Cambridge. In that year he published his 'Antiquitatis Academicæ Oxoniensis Apologia. In tres libros divisæ' (Oxford, sm. 4to; another edit. Oxford, 1620, is merely a re-issue of the first). It is the earliest history of Oxford, and, considering Twyne's youth, is 'a wonderful performance' (MADAN, Early Oxford Press, p. 72); but his arguments to prove the antiquity of Oxford are worthless. He defended the genuineness of the passage in Asser forged by Henry Savile [see under SAVILE, SIR HENRY, 1519-1622], on which the claim mainly rests; attacked Matthew Parker for omitting it from his edition of Asser, and sought by not over-scrupulous means to invest the passage with authority and to represent Camdeu as supporting it. Many of his other arguments are equally puerile (PARKER, Early Hist. of Oxford, pp. 39, 42-43, 58-60), but they are nevertheless the basis of those used by Wood, Hoarne, Ingram, and others.

Twyne was one of the delegates appointed by Archbishop Laud, then chancellor, to edit the famous Laudian statutes of the university, and the work fell mainly on Twyne and Richard Zouche [q. v.]. It was completed and laid before Laud in August 1634. It was printed with Laud's alterations in 1634 as 'Corpus Statutorum Universitatis Oxoniæ Pandectæ Constitutionum Academicarum, e libris publicis et regestis Universitatis consarcinatæ' (Oxford, fol.). Under the statutes thus printed the university was to be governed for a year; the 'full and authentic code' was formally approved in 1636 (this edition was edited in 1888 by Griffiths and Shadwell). Twyne also wrote the preface, and a passage in it 'extolling Queen Mary's days' was made one of the charges against Laud at his trial; he disclaimed having written it, but, according to Wood, Twyne was also innocent of the offending passage, which was added by another hand (LAUD, Works, iv. 324). For his services in drawing up the statutes, Twyne was in 1634 appointed first keeper of the university archives.

Twyne continued his residence at Oxford after the outbreak of the civil war, and wrote an 'Account of the Musterings of the University of Oxford, with other Things that happened there from Aug. 9, 1642, to July 13th, 1648, inclusively,' it was printed in 1733 as an appendix to Hearn's edition of H. de Morins's 'Chronicon sive Annales Prioratus de Dunstaple' (ii. 737-87). He was sequestered from his rectory at Rye by the Westminster assembly in 1644, and died unmarried in his lodgings in Penverthing Street, St. Aldate's, Oxford, on 14 July in the same year. He was buried in the inner chapel of Corpus Christi, to which college he left 'many choice books, whereof some were manuscripts of his own writings.'

Twyne's published works are only an infinitesimal fraction of the results of his labour. He was the earliest and most indefatigable of Oxford antiquaries, and his successors have done little more than make a more or less adequate use of the materials which Twyne collected on the early history and antiquities of Oxford. 'He read and made large excerpts from the muniments and registers of the university and colleges, the parish churches, and the city of Oxford; from manuscripts in the Bodleian Library, the libraries of the colleges of Oxford and Cambridge, of Thomas Allen, Sir Robert Cotton, and other private book-collectors; the Public Record Offices; the episcopal and chapter archives of Canterbury, Lincoln, Durham, &c.' (WOOD, Life and Times, ed. Clark, iv.

202). 'Wood did little more than put together materials accumulated by Twyne . . . there is hardly a single reference in these treatises [the 'History and Antiquities' and 'Annals'], which did not come, in the first instance, from Twyne, though there is 'an entire absence of acknowledgment of debt to Twyne's collections' (ib. iv. 223-4). These collections comprise some sixty manuscript volumes; they were bequeathed by Twyne's will (printed ib. iv. 202) to the university archives and Corpus Christi College. Twenty-six volumes are now in the lower room of the university archives, six are in the upper room, thirteen volumes are in Corpus Christi library, and thirteen more, only in part by Twyne, are among Wood MSS. D, E, and F. At least three were lost or destroyed by fire (for full description of the volumes see ib. iv. 203-22). No systematic attempt has been made to print these collections, but most of the volumes published by the Oxford Historical Society contain extracts from Twyne's manuscripts (cf. e.g. Oxford City Documents, ed. Thorold Rogers, p. 140 et passim).

[Authorities cited; Hist. MSS. Comm. 13th Rep. App. pt. iv.; Sussex Archaeol. Coll. xii. 60, 274; Horsfield's Lewes, i. 220-1, Sussex, i. 214, 501; Woodward's Hampshire, vol. iii.; Strype's Works; Land's Works, iv. 324, v. 84, 124, 149, 582; Wood's Athenae, iii. 108; Foster's Alumni Oxon. 1600-1714; Oxford Hist. Society's Publications, especially Fowler's Hist. of Corpus, Reg. Univ. Oxon., Clark's Life and Times of Wood, Madan's Early Oxford Press, Burrows's Collectanea, and Parker's Early Hist. of Oxford.] A. F. P.

TWYNE, JOHN (1501?-1581), schoolmaster and author, born about 1501 at Bullington, Hampshire, was son of William Twyne, and was descended from Sir Brian Twyne of Long Parish in the same county. He was educated, according to Wood, at New Inn, Oxford, but he seems to have frequented Corpus Christi College; he says he saw there Richard Foxe [q. v.], bishop of Winchester, 'old and blind'; John Lewis Vives [q. v.], and others (De Rebus Albionici, p. 2). He graduated B.O.L. on 31 Jan. 1524-5, and then married and became master of the free grammar school at Canterbury. His first literary work was an introductory epistle to an anonymous translation of Hugh of Caumpeden's 'History of Kyng Bocous and Sydracke.' Ames gives the date as 1510, which is doubtfully adopted in the British Museum catalogue; but no surviving copy has any date, and it is almost certain that it was published about 1530. The only dated book issued by Thomas Godfray, the publisher, was Thynne's edition of Chaucer, 1532, and 'Boccus' was printed at the expense of Robert Saltwood, who was a monk of St. Augustine's, Canterbury, at the dissolution in 1539.

Twyne's school was, according to Wood, 'much frequented by the youth of the neighbourhood,' and he consequently grew rich. In April 1539 he bought two messuages and two gardens in the parish of St. Paul's, Canterbury (Letters and Papers of Henry VIII., vol. xiv. pt. i. No. 906), and on 9 Dec. 1541 the chapter of the cathedral leased to him the rectory of St. Paul's (Lansd. MS. 982, f. 9). In 1534 William Winchelsea, a monk of St. Augustine's, accused Crammer of sending 'Twyne the schoolmaster to ride twice in one week to Sandwich to read a lecture of heresy' (Letters and Papers, vii. 1608). Twyne also purchased lands at Preston and Hardacre, Kent, and, having become prosperous, took an active part in the municipal affairs of Canterbury. In 1544-5 he served as sheriff of Canterbury (Lists of Sheriffs, 1808, p. 171). He was an alderman in 1553, and in January of that year represented the city in parliament (Hasted, Kent, iv. 406). He gave offence to Northumberland, and on 18 May the mayor of Canterbury was directed to send him up to London (Acts P.C. iv. 273). Twyne was re-elected for Canterbury on 7 Sept. following, and on 22 March 1553-4; he was mayor of the city in 1554, and actively opposed the insurgents during Wyatt's rebellion (Archaeol. Cant. xi. 143). In 1560, during an ecclesiastical visitation of Canterbury, Mr. Twyne, schoolmaster, was ordered to abstain from riot and drunkenness, and not to intermeddle with any public office in the town' (Tanner, p. 728); and in 1562 he was again in trouble with the privy council (Acts P.C. vii. 105). The cause may have been his 'addiction to the popish religion,' and Tanner says that he maligned Henry VIII, Matthew Parker, and John Foxe 'non minus acerbe quam injuste.' Twyne afterwards complained that he had been injured by Parker's accusations, and had through him been ejected from the keepership of the forest of Rivingwood in Littlebourne, near Canterbury, and deprived of his salary; on 29 Jan. 1575-6, after Parker's death, Twyne sought restitution from Burghley (Lansd. MS. 21, f. 111). Possibly he is the John Twyne admitted to Gray's Inn in 1566 (Foster, Reg. p. 33).

Twyne died at Canterbury on 24 Nov. 1581, and was buried on the 30th in St. Paul's Church, where a brass plate with an inscription commemorated him (Hasted, iv.

491; J. M. Cowper, Registers of St. Paul's, Canterbury, p. 205). By his wife Alice (1507-1507), daughter and coheiress of William Popor, whom he married in 1521, Twyno had issue three sons: John, who lived at Ilardern, and wrote verse; Lawrence [q. v.], and Thomas [q. v.]

Twyne enjoyed considerable reputation as a schoolmaster, antiquary, and scholar. In the examination of Thomas Bramston, a priest, in 1580, it was noted that he was 'brought up in the grammar school at Canterbury under old Mr. Twyne' (Cal. State Papers, Dom. 1581 80, p. 328). He was well read in Greek and Latin; Leland (Itinerary, p. 83), Holmehead, Somner (Antiq. Cant. p. 238), and Camden all testified to his antiquarian knowledge. In 1590 Thomas Twyns published his father's 'De Rebus Albioniciis, Britanniciis, atque Angliis Commentariorum libri duo,' London, 8vo. The book is chiefly interesting as containing Twyns's reminiscences of Dr. Nicholas Wotton [q. v.], John Dygon [q. v.], the last prior of St. Augustine's, Richard Foxe, Vivec, and other scholars (De Rebus Albioniciis, pp. 2, 71-2); it is now being edited by Father Gasquet, O.S.B. He also collected 'Communia Loca,' bequeathed, with his autograph will and a copy of his epitaph, to Corpus Christi College, Oxford (C. C. C. MS. cclvi, ff. 93, 190, cclviii. ff. 69 et seq.), by his grandson, Brian Twyne [q. v.]. In these collections he refers to lives he had written of Lupset, Wotton, Pagot, Thomas Wriothesley, and other contemporaries, but they have not been traced. Another work, 'Vita, Mores, Studia, et Fortunae Regum Angliae a Gulielmo Conquist. ad Henr. VIII,' to which he refers, was formerly extant at Corpus (see description of it in Lanod. MS. 825, f. 20), but is now lost; it is possibly the basis of 'A Booke containing the Portraiture of the Countenances and Attires of the Kings of England from William Conqueror unto . . . Elizabeth . . . diligently collected by T. T.,' London, 1597, 4to.

[Authorities cited: Works in Brit. Mus. Libr.; Lanod. MS. 21; Cox's Cat. MSS. in Coll. Antiquae Oxon.; Official Return Memb. of Parl.; Instod's Kouh, vol. iv.; Reg. Univ. Oxon. i. 130; Wood's Fasti, i. 66, and Athous, i. 163; Foster's Alumni Oxon.; Tanner's Bibl. Brit.-Hib. p. 720; Hist. MSS. Comm. 4th Rep. App. p. 254.]

A. F. P.

TWYNE, LAWRENCE (A. 1576), translator, eldest son of John Twyne [q. v.], by his wife Alice, daughter and coheiress of William Popor, was probably born about 1510 at Canterbury and educated at his father's school. He proceeded thence to All Souls' College, Oxford, where he was elected fellow and graduated B.C.L. on 17 Aug. 1564 (Reg. Univ. Oxon. i. 255). In 1573 he wrote some verses for his brother Thomas's translation of Lhuys's 'Briefvny of Britanyne,' but his only claim to notice is his 'Patterne of Painfull Adventures, containing the most excellent, pleasant, and variable Historie of the Strango Accidents that befell vnto Prince Apollonius, the Lady Lucina his Wife, and Tharsia his Daughter. Wherein the Vncertaintie of this World and fickle state of man's life are lively described. Gathered into English by Lawrence Twine, Gentleman. Imprinted at London by William How' (1576, 4to). No copy of this edition is known to be extant, but it was licensed to How on 17 July 1578, and the 'Stationers' Register' states that 'this book is sett forth in print with this title "The Patterne of poyntfull adventures"' (ANBER, Transcript, ii. 301). Another edition, with no date, was issued by Valentine Summes about 1695; a copy of it was sold at Uterson's sale for seven guineas, and from it Collier printed, with some inaccuracies, his edition in Shakespeare's 'Library' in 1843, and again in 1876. A third edition appeared in 1807, a year before the production of Shakespeare's 'Pericles'; a copy of this edition is in the Bodleian Library. The story of Apollonius of Tyre had been used in his 'Confessio Amantis,' by John Gower [q. v.], who borrowed it from Geoffrey of Viterbo. Another translation of the story from the French was published by Robert Copland [q. v.] in 1510. Twyno's version, however, was the one mainly used by the authors of 'Pericles' (see WINKINS, GEORGE), the production of which may have been suggested by the appearance of the third edition of Twyns's book in 1607. Steevens, Malone, and Douce erroneously assigned the authorship to Lawrence's brother, Thomas Twyne [q. v.]

Twyno is said (FOSTER, Alumni Oxon.) to have become rector of Twynham, Sussex, in 1578. He married Anne, daughter of one Holker of the county of Southampton, and had issue a son John and a daughter Anne (PURSER, Ilants Genealogies, pp. 222-3).

[Authorities cited: Wood's Athens Oxon. i. 464, ii. 130, and Fasti, i. 164; Collier's Bibl. Account and Prefaces to Reprints of the Patterns of Painfull Adventures; Corser's Collect. Anglo-Poet. iv. 42; Hazlitt's Handbook, p. 10.] A. F. P.

TWYNE, THOMAS, M.D. (1548-1613), physician, whose name is spelt Twine in the records of the College of Physicians, third son of John Twyno [q. v.], master of Canterbury free school, was born at Canterbury in 1543. Lawrence Twyne [q. v.] was his brother. He became a scholar of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, on 6 July 1500, and was elected a fellow on 9 Nov. 1561. He graduated B.A. on 18 April 1564, M.A. on 10 July 1568. He then studied medicine at Cambridge, where John Caius [q. v.] was actively engaged in the encouragement of that study. He settled at Lewes in Sussex, where he acquired a large practice. He did not graduate M.B. at Oxford till 10 July 1593, and then proceeded M.D. at Cambridge. He was admitted a licentiate of the College of Physicians on 7 May 1596, his patron, Lord Buckhurst, having in April 1593 written to ask the college to admit him a fellow. The college resolved to admit him as soon as the statutes would allow. He was versed in astrology and a friend of Dr. John Dee [q. v.] He died at Lewes on 1 Aug. 1613, and was buried in the chancel of the church of St. Peter's and Mary's Westout, where a brass to his memory remains to this day, bearing fourteen laudatory lines of Latin verse.

By his wife, Joanna Pumfrett, whom he was licensed to marry on 6 Oct. 1571, he was father of Brian Twyne [q. v.], the Oxford antiquary.

Some of Twyne's works are indicated by initials only, and others are translations or editions in which it is difficult to trace his exact share. Thus 'The Schoolmaster,' published in London in 1576 and 1583 in quarto, has also been attributed to Thomas Tureswell [q. v.] Twyne's chief works are: 1. 'The Breviary of Britayne,' 1572. 2. 'The Survey of the World,' 1572. 3. 'The Garland of Godly Flowers,' 1574; dedicated to Sir Nicholas Bacon. 4. 'The Tragedy of Tyrants,' 1575. 5. 'The Wonderful Workmanship of the World,' 1578; dedicated to Sir Francis Walsingham. 6. 'Physicke against Fortune, as well Prosperous as Adverse; translated from F. Petrark,' 1579. 7. 'New Counsell against the Plague; translated from Peter Drouet,' all printed in London. He also translated into English verse the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth books of the 'Æneid,' completing the work of Thomas Phaer [q. v.], which was published as 'The whole xiii. books of the Æneidos of Virgill' in 1573, in 1584, and in 1590 in quarto. He inclines to dulness both in prose and verse.

[Munk's Coll. of Phys. i. 108; Lower's Sussex Worthies, p. 183; Marriage Licences issued by the Bishop of London, i. 50; Wood's Athenæ Oxon. i. 329.] N. M.

TWYSDEN, JOHN, M.D. (1007-1688), physician, fourth son of Sir William Twysden, first baronet in 1611, was born at Roy-don Hall in East Peckham, Kent, in 1607 (HARRIS, Kent, ii. 275). Sir Roger Twysden [q. v.] and Sir Thomas Twysden [q. v.] were his brothers. John was educated at University College, Oxford, whence he matriculated on 20 June 1623; he left the university without a degree and entered the Inner Temple, where he was called to the bar in 1634. In 1645 he was in Paris (Mathematical Lucubrations), and in 1646 graduated M.D. at Angers. He was incorporated at Oxford 6 Nov. 1651 (Woon, ii. 107), and in 1654 settled in London, and on 22 Dec. was admitted a candidate of the College of Physicians, and on 20 Oct. 1664 was elected a fellow. His friend Walter Foster of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, placed in his hands the mathematical remains of Samuel Foster [q. v.] after the death of that Gresham professor in 1652. His first work, published in London in 1654, was an edition of Samuel Foster's 'Four Treatises of Dialling,' and in 1659 he published the residue of Foster's papers, with some mathematical essays of his own, in a folio volume entitled 'Miscellanæ, or Mathematicall Lucubrations.' He published in 1666 'Medicina veterum Vindicata, or an Answer to a book entitled Medela Medicinæ,' a defence of the orthodox medical doctrines of the day against Marchamont Needham [q. v.] The book, which is dedicated to Lord-chancellor Clarendon, and to the chiefs of the three courts, Keeling, Bridgman, and Hales, shows a good deal of general learning and much power of argument, while many passages illustrate the author's taste for mathematics, but it contains no clinical or pathological observations. In the same year he published another book of the same kind, an 'Answer to Medicina Instaurata' (London, 8vo). In 1676 Needham was defeated in an action by the College of Physicians before Twysden's brother, Sir Thomas Twysden, in the court of king's bench (GOODALE, Col. of Physicians, p. 278). He continued his mathematical studies, and published in 1685 'The Use of the Great Planisphere called the Analemma.' He died unmarried on 18 Sept. 1688. He was buried on the 15th in St. Margaret's Church, Westminster. His account of the last illness and death of his mother and two letters are extant in Brit. Mus. Addit. MSS. 84178 and 84176.

[Works; Munk's Coll. of Phys. i. 319; Ward's Gresham Professors; English Baronets, 1727, vol. i.] N. M.

TWYSDEN, SIR ROGER (1597-1672), historical antiquary, born in 1597, was the grandson of Roger Twysden (1542-1603), sheriff of Kent, and great-grandson of William Twysden, who married Elizabeth Roydon, eventual heiress of Roydon Hall in East Peckham, Kent. The Roydon estates passed by this marriage to the Twysdens, themselves an ancient Kentish family. The antiquary's father was William Twysden (1568-1629), who in 1591 was married by Alexander Nowel [q. v.], dean of St. Paul's, to Anno (d. 1638), oldest daughter of Sir Moyle Finch of Eastwell, Kent, and sister of Sir Hencage Finch [q. v.]. In 1597 he bore part in the 'Island Voyage', and in 1603 was selected to accompany James I into London, being knighted by that king at the Charterhouse on 11 May (MITCHELL). He became a gentleman usher of the privy chamber, and in 1619 was one of the canopy-bearers at the funeral of Queen Anne of Denmark (NICHOLS, Progresses of James I, iii. 609). Upon the creation of the order of baronets Sir William was included in the number on 29 June 1611. He died at his house in Redcross Street, London, on 8 Jan. 1628-9, leaving behind him, as his son records, the memory not only of a soldier and a courtier, but also of a devout upholder of the English church and of a ripe scholar. He was well acquainted with Hebrew, and formed the nucleus of the collection of Greek and Hebrew manuscripts so highly treasured by his son. His correspondence with Lord Wotton, 1605-8, is among the Additional manuscripts at the British Museum (34176 passim). The first baronet's sister, Margaret Twysden, married Henry Vane of Hadlow, and was mother of Sir Henry Vane (1589-1654) [q. v.], who was thus first cousin to the subject of this article. Sir Edward Dering [q. v.] was his second cousin (see pedigree in Proceedings in Kent, Camden Soc. p. 3). To his mother, Lady Anne Twysden, of whom Sir Roger left a wonderfully attractive portrait among his manuscript memoranda, Johan Hind dedicated his 'Storie of Stories', 1632 (some of her letters to her husband are in Addit. MS. 34178). Of Sir Roger's two sisters, Elizabeth (1600-1655) married in 1622 Sir Hugh Cholmley [q. v.]; while Anne (1603-1670) married Sir Christopher Yelverton, bart. (d. 1654), the grandson of the speaker. Of his brothers, Sir Thomas and John are separately noticed.

Roger was educated at St. Paul's school under Alexander Gill the elder [q. v.], and was entered as a fellow commoner on 8 Nov. 1614 at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, where he does not appear, however, to have proceeded to a degree. He was outered at Gray's Inn on 2 Feb. 1622-3 (Postm. Regist. p. 169). He succeeded his father as second baronet in 1629, and he was much occupied for some years in building and planting, and otherwise improving the property on his estate. He obtained from Charles I a charter of free warren to make a park at East Peckham. But he seems also during those years to have cultivated the friendship of John Philipot (see the latter's Villare Cantianum, p. 105), and to have laid the foundation of his linguistic attainment. As with a number of the more enlightened country gentlemen of his time, the law of the constitution was a favourite study, and it was the conclusions he drew from it that inspired him to resist any infringement of ancient rights from whatever quarter it might come.

Though no action seems to have been taken against him, he obstinately refused to pay ship-money, and in reference to the events of 1650 he wrote at the commencement of his journal: 'Never did any man with more earnest expectation long for a parliament than I did.'

There is a very interesting memorandum in Twysden's own hand concerning the general election preceding the Short parliament. 'When first the speech of a parliament so long neglected began about the end of Michaelmas terme 1639, many men were spoken of as fit to stand to bes knights for Kent. Amongst the rest myself was invyted to be one, which I declyned, as being a matter of great expence, and indeeds not thinking the county would chuse me; so I ever put it off as altogether unworthy of it, yet professing I would bee most glad to doe the country all service.' Twysden determined to support Sir Henry Vane, and tried to enlist his kinsman, Sir Edward Dering, in the same interest; Dering at first consented, but eventually decided to stand himself. Twysden rejoined by writing round to his friends and announcing his own candidature, with the result that he was returned on 16 March 1640 in conjunction with (Sir) Norton Knatchbull (Members of Parl. i. 481). Sir Giovanni Francesco Biondi [q. v.] wrote him a letter of congratulation from Switzerland upon his election, which was moreover, as might have been anticipated, the occasion of 'a great contestation' between Twysden and Dering. The result of this antagonism was clearly seen when, after the dissolution of the Short parliament and the fresh election of October 1640, Twysden lost his seat and Dering was returned in his stead.

The proceedings of the Long parliament rapidly wrought a change in Twysden's political attitude. Stauneh as he had been in his resistance to illegal taxation by the king, his sympathy with the parliamentary opposition was greatly impaired by the proceedings against the bishops and chapters and the committal of Laud. The impeachments of judges and ministers alarmed him, and he looked upon the attainder and execution of Strafford (with its implied extension of the significance of the word 'treason') as 'a fearful precedent against the liberty of the subject.' He had not enough respect for the king to allow him to go out with Falkland; but, on the other hand, the encroachments of parliament, concluding with the ordinance by which that body assumed the command of the militia, completely alienated him from their cause. The spring assizes at Maidstone in 1642 afforded the opportunity of making a public demonstration of dissatisfaction. A petition had been sent from a portion of Kent approving the conduct of the parliament; but a number of country gentlemen complained that this did not express the real sense of the county, and they determined to present a counter-petition of their own. The ordinary grand jury was accordingly re-inforced by a number of substantial men, justices of the peace, including Dering (who had now been expelled the house), Sir George Strode [q. v.], and others. Sir Roger Twysden did not sign the original draft, but he almost certainly helped to frame it. The chief clauses of this notorious document demanded of the parliament that the laws should be duly executed against the Roman Catholics, but that the episcopal government and the solemn liturgy of the church of England should be carefully preserved, and at the same time energetic provision made against the aggressions of schismatics, whereby 'heresy, profaneness, libertinism, anabaptism, and atheism were promoted.' The petition may, in fact, be accepted as embodying the spirit which was soon to animate the king's supporters in the civil war; and, when the parliament decided to treat the petitioners as criminals to be punished rather than answered, civil war became inevitable. The draft petition, having been approved by a majority of the jury (25 March 1642), was circulated throughout Kent for signatures and then printed as a separate pamphlet, though, from the fact that as many as could be collected were subsequently burned by the public hangman, copies are now sufficiently scarce. The petition was not actually presented until 30 April [see LOVEBLACE, RICHARD.]

In the meantime, on 1 April 1642, Twysden appeared at the bar of the House, whither he had been summoned as a delinquent along with Dering and Strode. He confessed that he had signed the petition, but without 'plot or design' therein, and he humbly desired that he might be bailed. This request was acceded to on 9 April on condition of his not stirring ten miles from London, and Sir Robert Filmer [q. v.] and Francis Finch were his securities. Thomas Jordan [q. v.], the city poet, referred to the situation in a quatrain of his popular poem 'The Resolution' (1642):

Ask me not why the House delights
Not in our two wise Kentish knights;
Their counsel never was thought good
Because they were not understood.

On 15 May 1642 a counter-petition, carefully fostered by the parliament, having been presented as from the county of Kent, Twysden was allowed to return to his house, resolved, he says, to live quietly and meddle as little as possible with any business whatsoever. Nevertheless a very short time elapsed before he was involved in the defiant 'Instructions from the county of Kent to Mr. Augustine Skinner' for transmission to the House of Commons. This was prepared under Twysden's guidance as an answer to the despatch of a parliamentary committee to Maidstone assizes at the close of July 1642 'upon a credible information that ill-affected persons were endeavouring to disperse' scandalous reports of the parliament. The house was enraged at these 'Instructions,' and on 5 Aug. Twysden's bail was disallowed and he was recommitted to the sergeant, who confined him at the Two Tobacco Pipes tavern, near Charing Cross. 'While I continued there,' he writes, 'I grew acquainted with two noble gentlemen, Sir Basil Brook and Sir Kenelm Digby, persons of great worth and honour, who whilst they remained with mee made the prison a place of delight, such was their conversation and so great their knowledge.' These two knights, however, were soon released, and early in September 1642, the anxiety of the house having been allayed as to the alleged disaffection in Kent, Sir Roger himself was again enlarged upon bail, at the same time receiving friendly advice from his gaolers to the effect that he had better abstain for a while from visiting Kent. He took this counsel in good part, and procured a passport for a journey on the continent; but the accidental death of his kinsman, Sir John Finch, who was to have accompanied him, disappointed this plan (for the connection between the Twysden and Finch families, see Proceedings in Kent, p. 17). Twysden accordingly retired to his house in Redcross Street. Here, in the neighbourhood of the Tower, during 1612-3 he was able to continue his researches into the national history and to acquire that familiarity with 'Record evidence' which is so observable in all his works. In December 1612 he was called upon to bear a part in the huge loan (of the nature of a monthly subsidy) advanced by the city to parliament for the maintenance of the army, he being assessed to pay 400*l.*, or a twentieth, as 'due under the ordinance and by consent of the city.'

It was in vain that he pleaded that as a casual inhabitant and non-resident of London he was not liable to the tax; on his proving obstinate his valuables were distrained, and the success of the bailiffs in securing a twentieth was so complete, wrote the victim, that 'they left nothing worth aught behind.' In the early part of 1643 some overtures were made to him by Sir Christopher Neville and others to induce him to join the king; but, apart from the danger to his estate, he considered that 'he should bee ashamed to live in Oxford and not bee in the army,' of which his years and his health would not admit. In May, therefore, he sent his eldest son, William (b. 1635), abroad, under Dr. Hannet Ward, and had the intention of following them as speedily as possible. He set out in disguise on 9 June 1643 in the company of some French and Portuguese traders. Unhappily he was recognised when he had got no further than Bromley by Sir Anthony Weldon and other members of the Kentish committee. At first he denied his identity, but his old passport was found upon him, whereupon Weldon remarked that he was 'either Sir Roger Twysden or a rogue who ought to be whipped.' He was forthwith sent back to London by the committee and committed to the Southwark counter (10 June). One charge brought against him was that he was conveying important intelligence abroad concealed in nutshells, an accusation which derived a certain plausibility, as he himself admits, from the fact that he was taking with him some disinfectants done up in this form. Shortly after his imprisonment his estates were sequestered, and a quantity of his ancestral timber, on which he greatly prided himself, was felled; the usual allowance was, however, made to Lady Twysden, who remained in residence at Roydon Hall. The royalist successes of this summer (especially in July 1643) enhanced the value of Twysden and other leading cavaliers as hostages, and for a short period a number of them were transferred to the shipping riding in the Thames. On 15 Aug., however, Twysden was released from the Prosperous

Sarah, George Hawes, master, and remanded to the Counter. Thence, after several petitions, through the interest of his brother-in-law, Sir Christopher Yelverton, he was in a few months' time transferred to Lambeth. The keeper of the prison (late palace) there was Alexander Leighton [q.v.], the former victim of Laud and the Star-chamber, of whom Sir Roger gives a very interesting account. There he seems to have pursued even more effectively the manuscript studies which he had formerly carried on at the Tower, and to have done much of the collative work and research subsequently embodied in his well-known 'Decem Scriptores.' Early in 1645, being weary of his prison, he sent in his submission to the committee for compounding; on 6 March 1645 he was fined 8,000*l.*, his estate being 2,000*l.* a year, and on 9 Dec. following the house ordered that he should be bailed. He now removed to a lodging in St. Anne's Street, Westminster; but the sequestration remained in force owing to his declared inability to pay his fine. On 31 May 1649 this was reduced to 1,500*l.*, and eventually, in January 1650, he compounded for 1,310*l.* (Cal. Comm. for Compounding, p. 804). He ultimately returned to Kent on 19 Jan. 1650, and he now spent ten years quietly at home, occupied in literary pursuits, nursing the estate, which had so severely suffered, and cautiously abstaining from any interference with public events. He managed to get his assessment for the twentieth reduced from 600*l.* to 390*l.* (see Cal. Comm. for Advance of Money, 1894), but he still remained an object of suspicion to the government. On 26 April 1661 soldiers came and searched his house and carried him prisoner to Leeds Castle, but he was released in about a week's time. Upon the Restoration he was replaced upon the commissions of the peace and of oyer and terminer, became a deputy-lieutenant of his county, and was made a commissioner under the 'Act for confirming and restoring of ministers.' Yet he was never reconciled to the court (Arlington Correspondence). One of his last acts was to throw up his commission as a deputy-lieutenant sooner than about the lord-lieutenant of the county in what he believed to be an illegal imposition—the providing of uniforms as well as arms for the militia. But he was spared any outward sign of this disapproval of the Cabal ministry, for on 27 June 1672, while riding through the Malling woods on his way to petty sessions, he was suddenly attacked with apoplexy, and died the same day. He was buried at East Peckham.

He married, on 27 Jan. 1635, Isabella, youngest daughter and coheirress of Sir Nicholas Saunders of Ewell in Surrey; she died, aged 52, on 11 March 1660-7, and was buried in East Peckham church on 17 March (her holograph 'Diary,' 1645-51, comprises Addit. MSS. 34169-72). Sir Roger gives an affecting picture of her last hours, and sums up: 'She was the savor of my estate. Never man had a better wife, never children a better mother.' They had issue (1) Sir William, third baronet (d. 27 Nov. 1697), grandfather of Philip Twysden, bishop of Raphoe (from 1747 until his death on 2 Nov. 1752), whose daughter Frances married in 1770 the fourth Earl of Jersey, and as 'Lady Jersey' is conspicuous in 'Walpole's Correspondence'; (2) Roger, who died without issue in 1676; (3) Charles, a traveller in the east, who died in 1690; and three daughters: Anna, who married John Porter of Lamberhurst, Kent; Isabella (d. 1726); and Frances, who married Sir Peter Killigrow of Amewick, and died in 1711.

Twysden had a knowledge of and affection for the usages and liberties of his country scarcely, if at all, exceeded in an age which comprehended the great names of Coke, Selden, Somner, Spelman, Evelyn, Cotton, and Savile. Like Selden, and like his early friend D'Ewes, amid all the distraction of political life and public duties as a magistrate and county magnate, he devoted the best energies of a powerful mind to the investigation of historical antiquity. Unlike them, as we learn from Kemble—who thoroughly explored his literary remains—his published works give only a slight notion of the resources of his well-stored mind or the energy of his application. To form an adequate conception of these one should have studied his numerous commonplace books, his marginal notes, his interleaved copies, and the treatises by him still awaiting a competent editor. Beneath these acquisitions is discernible a character remarkable for steadfastness, piety, and true manliness. 'Loyal, yet not a thorough partisan of the king; liberal, yet not proposing to go all lengths with the parliament; an earnest lover of the church of England, yet anxious for a reconciliation with Rome could such be effected without the compromise of any point of bible Christianity; a careful manager, yet an indulgent landlord; a somewhat stern and humorous man, yet a devoted son and husband and an affectionate father—such is the picture of a man who even to this day excites in us feelings of respect and attachment' (KEMBLE).

The three of his works that were printed and published in Twysden's lifetime are: 1. 'The Commoners Liberty: or the Englishman's Birth-right,' London, 1618, proving from Magna Carta the illegality of his arrest and imprisonment. 2. 'Historia Anglicanæ Scriptores Decem: Simeon Monachus Dunelmensis, Johannes Prior Hagustaldensis, Ricardus Prior Hagustaldensis, Ailredus Abbas Rievallensis, Radulphus de Diceto Londoniensis, Johannes Brompton Jornallensis, Gervasius Monachus Dorobornensis, Thomas Stubbs Dominicanus, Gulielmus Thorn Cantuariensis, Henricus Knighton Leicestrensis, ex vetustis manuscriptis nunc primum in lucem editi. Adjectis variis lectionibus Glossario indiceque copioso . . . sumptibus Cornelii Bee, London, 1659, folio. The introduction 'Lectori' is signed Roger Twysden, and dated 'ex ædibus meis Cantianis.' Three of these chronicles, those of Simon of Durham [1882], Henry Knighton [1889], and Ralph of Diceto [1876], have since been edited separately in the Rolls Series, the editors in each case speaking of Twysden's work with respect. The last-mentioned work, drawn in the main from the royal manuscript in the king's library at St. James's, was carefully collated with a copy of the Lambeth manuscript (the codex A of the Rolls version). The work entitles Twysden to rank along with Camden, Selden, Savile, and Kennet as a pioneer in the study of English medieval history. 'Even the Puritans themselves,' says Hearne, 'affecting to be Maccenas with Cromwell at their head, displayed something like a patriotic ardour in purchasing copies of this work as soon as it appeared' (pref. to his edition of OTTERBOURN; cf. DIBNET, Libr. Comp. pp. 161-2). 3. 'An Historical Vindication of the Church of England in point of Schism as it stands separated from the Roman and was Reformed 1<sup>o</sup> Elizabeth.' The address 'To the Reader' is 'given from my house in East Peckham on 22 May 1657,' and the work appeared in July (London, 8vo; 2nd edit. 1675; Pitt Press, 1847, with additional matter, and embodying the author's latest marginalia and notes). In this work Twysden gives a most able expository sketch of early resistance to Romish authority from the time of Wilfrid's appeal, of the gradual encroachments of the papal power, and 'how the kings of England proceeded in their separation from Rome.'

In addition to these separate printed works Twysden aided in the production of the Cambridge edition in 1644 of 'Ἀρχαιολογία, sive De Priscis Anglorum legibus libri,' prefixing to the supplement, 'Leges Willielmi Conquestoris et Henrici filii ejus,' a Latin preface dated August 1614. In 1653 he prepared for press Sir Robert Filmer's 'Questio Quodlibetica, or a Discourse whether it may bee Lawfull to take use for Monay' (1653), prefixing a long argument in favour of usury 'To the Reader' (dated East Peckham, 9 Oct. 1652). This was reprinted in 1678, and in the 'Harleian Miscellany' (vol. x.) Prefixed to the British Museum copy of the 1653 edition is a list of 180 works published by Humphrey Mosely in St. Paul's Churchyard.

Twysden's unfinished treatise on 'The Beginners of a Monastick Life in Asia, Africa, and Europe,' was first prefixed to the 1698 edition of Spelman's 'History and Fate of Sacrilego,' and it does not seem to have been reprinted. He maintains 'with Latimer' that a few monasteries of good report might well have been saved in every shire, and deprecates the extirpating 'zeal of those in love with the Possessions Religious People were endowed with.'

Among the Roydon manuscripts that have been since printed are (i.) 'An Account of Queen Anne Bullon from a Manuscript in the Handwriting of Sir R. Twysden, 1623, with the Endorsement, "I received this from my uncle Wyat, who being young had gathered many notes touching this Lady not without an intent to have opposed Saunders"' (Twysden's grandfather, Roger, had married Anne, eldest daughter of Sir Thomas Wyatt [q. v.], the rebel). This was privately printed about 1815. The original manuscript has some interesting notes by Sir Roger upon the margin. (ii.) 'Certain Considerations upon the Government of England,' first edited for the Camden Society in 1849, with a most able 'Introduction' by John Mitchell Kemble [q. v.], the historian. Of more interest than those, however, is (iii.) Twysden's own manuscript journal, formerly among the papers at Roydon House, and now in the British Museum (Addit. MSS. 34163-5), entitled 'An Historical Narrative of the two Houses of Parliament, and either of them their Committees and Agents' violent Proceedings against Sir Roger Twysden.' This document, which constitutes the main authority for the middle portion of Twysden's life, was first printed (with a facsimile of the front page) in the 'Archæologia Cantiana' (1858-61, vols. i-iv.)

A large portion of Twysden's cherished books and manuscripts, many of them annotated, were, together with those of Edward Lhwyd [q. v.], in the library of Sir John Sobriest of Beechwood, Hertfordshire, and were sold by Leigh & Sothby on 6 April 1807. Among the books then acquired by the British Museum is a copy of Sarpi's 'Historia del Concilio Tridentino,' London, 1619, with Twysden's autograph signature under the date 1627, and a large number of marginal notes in his own hand; these are pronounced by Lord Acton to be 'in part of real value' (1876, manuscript note); among the manuscripts is an excellent one of Ovid's 'Metamorphoses,' which was used by Thomas Farnaby [q. v.] for his edition of 1637. Sir Roger possessed the rare unexpurgated edition of John Cowell's 'Interpreter' (Cambridge, 1607); this he interleaved, and his valuable 'Adversaria' are described in 'Archæologia Cantiana' (ii. 221, 313).

[Kemble's Introduction to Twysden's Government of England (Camden Soc.), 1849; Proceedings in Kent in 1640, ed. Larking, for the same society, 1862; Botham's Baronetage, i. 126-9; Cotton's Baronetage, i. 214; Carew's Works, ed. Elsworth; Berry's Kent Genealogies, p. 310; Burke's Extinct Baronetage; Hasted's Kent, ii. 213, 275, 728; Harleian Miscellany, vol. x.; Nichols's Progresses of James I.; Gent. Mag. 1850, ii. 245; Brydges's Rosticata, iii.; Cotton's Fasti Eccl. lib. iii. 366; Evelyn's Diary, ed. Wheatley, ii. 188; Gardiner's Hist. of England, x. 182 sq.; Notes and Queries, 2nd ser. x. 471; Archæologia Cantiana, i-iv., v. 89 n., 105, 110, viii. 59, 60, x. 211, 213, xviii. 124, 138; Addit. MSS. 34147-78 (Twysden family of East Peckham Collections); Brit. Mus. Cat. The name Twysden is conspicuous by its absence from the Encyclopædias, from the Britannica downwards.] T. S.

TWYSDEN or TWISDEN, SIR THOMAS (1602-1683), judge, second son of Sir William Twysden, bart., by his wife, Anne, daughter of Sir Moyle Finch, bart., of Eastwell, Kent, was born at Roydon Hall, East Peckham, in that county, on 2 Jan. 1601-2. Dr. John Twysden [q. v.] and Sir Roger Twysden [q. v.] were his brothers. He entered as a fellow commoner on 8 Nov. 1614 Emmanuel College, Cambridge, to which he afterwards gave 10*l.* towards the rebuilding of the chapel. In November 1617 he was admitted a member of the Inner Temple, where he was called to the bar in 1626, and elected a bencher in 1646. He appears in Crooke's 'Reports' as arguing in Michaelmas term 1639 a point of law concerning the Kentish custom of gavelkind. His name is there and thenceforth always spelt Twisden, a fashion which he adopted by way of distinction from the rest of his family, upon his marriage in that year with Jane, daughter of John Thomlinson of Whitby, Yorkshire, and sister of Matthew Thomlinson [q. v.]

To his brother-in-law's interest Twisden probably owed something during the Commonwealth and protectorate; for, though a staunch loyalist, he increased his practice, and was even selected by the council of state to advise on an important question of international law (cf. the opinion signed by him, jointly with Maynard, Hale, and Glynn, 18 Nov. 1653, on the liability of the goode of the Spanish ambassador to attachment for debt within the city of London; THURLOW, State Papers, i. 603-4). In the following year he was made serjeant-at-law (9 Nov.) On 18 May 1656 the part which he took with Maynard and Wadham Wyndham in the defence of the merchant Cony, who had the audacity to dispute the right of the de facto government to raise taxes, occasioned his committal to the Tower for a few days [see MAYNARD, SIR JOHN, 1602-1690].

On the Restoration Twysden was confirmed in the statue of serjeant-at-law by a new call, advanced to a puisne judgeship in the king's bench, and knighted (22 June, 2 July 1660). As a member of the commission for the trial of the regicides he narrowly missed sitting in judgment on his brother-in-law, whom, however, the government eventually preferred to call as a witness. He also concurred in the sentences passed on the Fifth-monarchy fanatic James (32 Nov. 1661), Sir Henry Vane (1612-1662) [q.v.], and the nonjuring quakers Crook, Grey, and Bolton (May 1662). Towards George Fox and Margaret Fell, whose conscientious scruples brought them before him at the Lancaster assizes in March 1663-4, as also to other members of the Society of Friends who refused to abandon their principles, he showed a certain tenderness, and in consultation with the House of Lords strongly condemned the policy of multiplying ecclesiastical offences. He was present at the meeting of the judges held at Serjeants' Inn on 28 April 1666 to discuss the several points of law involved in Lord Morley's case. The same year (13 June) a baronetcy was conferred upon him. He was a member of the court of summary jurisdiction established in 1667 to try causes between owners and occupiers of land and tenements within the districts ravaged by the fire of London (18 and 19 Car. II, c. 7). In recognition of his services in this capacity the corporation of London caused his portrait to be painted by Michael Wright and placed in the Guildhall (1671). There are also engraved portraits in the British Museum and Lincoln's Inn. Being absent from court on 27 June 1677 during the argument of the return to Shaftesbury's habeas corpus, he sent his opinion in writing that the earl should be remanded. In 1678, by reason of his great age and infirmities, he was dispensed from attendance in court, Sir William Dolben [q.v.] being sworn in his place (23 Oct.). He retained, however, judicial rank, and is said to have drawn a pension of 500*l.* per annum until his death, 2 Jan. 1682-1683. His remains were interred in the church of East Malling, in which parish he had purchased in 1656, and subsequently imparked, the estate of Bradbourne. The baronetcy, in which he was succeeded by his eldest son, Sir Roger Twysden, became extinct on the death of Sir John Twysden, the eighth baronet, 1 Jan. 1841. Twysden compiled a collection of 'Reports,' of which the original is missing, but Addit. MS. 10619 appears to be an authentic transcript.

[Hasted's Kent, 1782, ii. 213, 275; Hasted's Kent, ed. Drake, i. 224; Le Neve's Pedigrees of Knights (Harl. Soc.), p. 86; Dugdale's Visitation of York (Surtees Soc.), p. 66; Manningham's Diary (Camden Soc.), pp. iii, x; Proc. in the County of Kent (Camden Soc.), p. 4; Sir Roger Twysden's Government of England, ed. Kemble (Camden Soc.), Introd. p. xxiv n.; Blomefield's Collect. Cantabrig. p. 117; Noble's Protectoral House of Cromwell, i. 420, 438; Style's Reports, pp. 106, 112, 140, 206, 246; Herbert's Memoirs of the last two years of the Reign of Charles I, p. 123; Camden Misc. iii. 61; Liber Hibernie, i. 7; Metcalfe's Book of Knights, p. 215; Cal. Clarendon State Papers, ii. 314; Clarendon State Papers, iii. 491, Suppl. p. xxxii; Siderfin's Reports, p. 3; Cobbett's State Trials, v. 986, 1178, vi. 67-208, 630-56, 770, 1297; Kelynge's Crown Cases, ed. Loveland, p. 85; North's Examen, pp. 57, 73; Cal. Comm. for Advance of Money, 1612-56 i. 303; Cal. State Papers, Dom., 1661-1671; Hist. MSS. Comm. 4th Rep. App. p. 417, 5th Rep. App. p. 171, 7th Rep. App. p. 471, 8th Rep. App. i. 116, 127, 138, 141, 9th Rep. App. ii. 5, 12; Rawlinson MS. C. 719, pp. 7, 23; Clarendon and Rochester Corresp. i. 3; Hatton Corresp. (Camden Soc.) i. 164; Sir Thomas Raymond's Reports, p. 475; Marr. Lic. West. and Vic. Gen. (Harl. Soc.), p. 67; Granger's Biogr. Hist. Engl. iii. 370; Cat. of Sculpture, &c., at Guildhall; Prior's Descr. Acc. of the Guildhall of the City of London, p. 79; Memoirs of the Judges whose portraits are preserved in Guildhall, 1791; Harvy's Account of the Great Fire in London in 1666; Wotton's Baronetage, vol. iii. pt. ii. p. 497; Foster's Baronetage; Foss's Lives of the Judges.] J. M. R.

TYE, CHRISTOPHER (1497?-1573), musician, was almost certainly a native of the eastern countee, where the name was common. Fuller, not knowing his birth-place, counts him among the 'Worthies of Westminster;' Anthony Wood's statement, 'He seems to be a western man born,' is quite unfounded. There can be little doubt that the Tye who was fifth choirboy at King's College, Cambridge, in the third quarter of 1511, and second choirboy in August 1512, was Christopher Tye. The commons books for the preceding ten years are lost; but it may be presumed Tye had been some time before 1511 in the choir, and was born about 1497.

The name Tye next appears in the commons books for Michaelmas to Christmas 1527, when he was one of the singing-men; the full name, 'Christopher Tye, clericus,' is first met with in the Mundum books for Lady-day to Michaelmas, 1537. A 'Richard Tye, clericus,' who died in 1545, was also in the choir of King's College, and some of the earlier records may refer to him. In later life Christopher Tye appears in close connection with Dr. Richard Cox (1500-1581) [q. v.], who entered King's College in 1519.

In 1538 the Cambridge grace book recorded that Christopher Tye, having studied the art of music ten years, with much practice in composing and in teaching boys, was granted the degree of Mus. Bac., on condition of his composing a mass to be sung soon after Commencement, or on the day when the king's visit was celebrated, or at least that some specimen of his skill should be displayed at the Commencement. How much longer Tye remained at King's College is uncertain, as the Mundum books for 1538-42 are missing; but he probably left in 1541 or 1542. At Michaelmas 1543 Tye received 10*l.* for a year's salary as master of the choirboys at Ely. In 1545 Tye proceeded to the degree of Mus. Doc.; he was required to compose a mass to be sung at the Commencement, and was to be presented 'habitu non regentis.' He was permitted to wear the robes of a doctor of medicine, as there were no distinctive robes for musical graduates until a recent period. In 1547 Cox became chancellor of the university of Oxford, and in 1548 Tye was incorporated thoro as Mus. Doc. He was apparently still at Ely, as the treasurer's rolls record the payment of his salary in Michaelmas 1547; but the rolls for the next twelve years are lost. Tye is not heard of again until 1553, when he published his 'Actes of the Apostles,' calling himself gentleman of the Chapel Royal, and dedicating the work to Edward VI in terms which suggest that he was, or had been, under Cox, the young king's teacher. This supposition is strengthened by a passage in Samuel Rowley's chronicle-play, 'When you see me, you know me,' 1605, in which Tye is introduced, and addressed by Edward as 'Our music's lecturer.' The title of gentleman of the Chapel Royal does not necessarily imply that Tye must have left Ely. Hawkins and others have supposed that he also taught Edward's sisters, which is possible in the case of Elizabeth, but hardly as regards Mary, who was much older, and had played to the French ambassadors in 1527.

Tye is not heard of in Mary's reign, nor does his name occur in any published list of the Chapel Royal, nor in the cheques-book, which begins in 1561. On 23 May 1559 the dean and chapter of Ely executed a deed by which Tye was granted 10*l.* annually as master of the boys and organist. Since Tye had previously received the same salary, it is possible that he had left his post and was formally reappointed. But he received only half a year's salary at Michaelmas 1561; and in 1562 Robert White (d. 1574) [q. v.] succeeded him as 'informator choristarum.' Tye had already taken deacon's orders in July 1560, and in November following Dr. Cox, now bishop of Ely, ordained him priest. In the register he is called canon of the cathedral. He must have been previously made incumbent of Doddington (Donyngton)-cum-March, as he compounded for the first-fruits on 25 Sept.; a return sent by Cox in the same year reports that Dr. Tye lived at Doddington with his family, was not yet capable of preaching ('non tamen habilis ad predicandum'), nor specially licensed theist. The living at a later period became the richest in England, and was divided into seven. The bishop took a singular bond from Tye, who engaged not to lease any part of the benefice without the bishop's consent, 'but from year to year;' and since this bond was executed at the request of Tye's wife, it indicates either that he was incompetent in business matters, or that he was under the influence of his son Peter, a disreputable man, who had by fraud obtained ordination and was rector of Trinity Church, Ely. These matters were among the grounds of accusation against Dr. Cox after Tye's death (STRYP, Annals, vol. ii. App.). In 1561 Tye appears as rector of Newton-cum-Capella, and of Wilburham Parva; he had paid firstfruits for the former on 13 May, but not for the latter, which was ordered to be sequestrated. The matter was in some way arranged, and the money was paid on 19 Oct. He resigned this living in 1567, and Newton in 1570. On 26 June 1570 the living of Doddington-cum-March was ordered to be sequestrated, as Tye had not paid certain dues. On 26 Aug. 1571 Lesloy, bishop of Rose, then in the custody of Cox at Doddington, noted in his diary (Barnatyns Miscellany, 1855) that he had written some verses, and given them to Dr. Tye 'for aue argument, to mak the same in Inglis.' Tye died in the following year, as the bishop's register records the institution, on 15 March 1572-3, of Hugo Bellet to the living of Doddingdon-cum-March, vacant 'per mortem naturalem venerabilis viri Christoferi Tye musices doctoris ultimi incumbentis.' His will has not yet been discovered.

We have no certain information of Tye's children, except Peter, who married in 1564 at Trinity Church, Ely, where seven of his children were baptised. But it is extremely probable that Mary Tye, who married Robert Rowley at Trinity Church in 1560, and her sister Ellen, who married the composer Robert White, were his daughters, with two others whose existence we learn from Ellen White's will, in which their mother, Katherine Tye, is also named. An Agnes Tye was married in 1575 at Wilbraham Parva.

It is highly probable that Samuel Rowley the dramatist was a near connection, perhaps a son, of Mary Rowley. In one scene of 'When you see me, you know me,' he introduces Dr. Tye to perform vocal and instrumental music before Prince Edward, who thanks him and adds:

I oft have heard my Father merrily speake
In your hye praise, and thus his Highnesse sayth England one God, one truth, one Doctor hath For Musicks Art, and that is Doctor Tye, Admir'd for skill in Musickes harmonis.

Tye then presents his 'Actes of the Apostles' to the prince, who promises they shall be sung in the Chapel Royal. In Morley's 'Introduction to Practicall Musicke,' 1597, Tye is repeatedly quoted as a leading authority. Meres mentions him in 'Palladis Tamia' among England's 'excellent Musicians;' and there is an allusion to him in Nashe's 'Have with you to Saffron Walden,' 1596.

The only work (with one doubtful exception) which Tye published, was a doggerel versification of the first fourteen chapters of the Acts of the Apostles, with music to the first two stanzas of each chapter, 'to syunge and also to play upon the Lute, very necessary for studentes after theyr studie to fyle theyr wyttes, and also for all Christians that cannot synge, to reade the good and Godly stories of the lyves of Christ hys Apostles,' 1558. There are copies at the British Museum and Lambeth Palace. The compositions are not syllabic tunes, all but one having at least a point of imitation. Considered as part-songs they are beyond praise. A psalter by Seagar was published in the same year with two tunes exactly similar in style; and the popular madrigal, 'In going to my naked bed,' usually ascribed to Richard Edwards, has a strong family likeness to them. Tye's third and eighth tunes were soon shortened and simplified into the usual four-lined 'common metre' psalm-tune, and attained universal popularity; they appear in Thomas East's 'Whole Booke of Psalmes,' 1592, Allison's 'Psalter,' 1599, and Ravenscroft's 'Psalter,' 1621, under the names of 'Windsor or Eaton,' and 'Winchester.' The former, known in Scotland as 'Dundee,' is immortalised in Burns's 'Cotter's Saturday Night.' It was called 'Dundas Tuns' in Andro Hart's 'Psalter,' 1615. 'Winchester' is now sung to the Christmas carol, 'While shepherds watched their flocks by night.' In both tunes the second line varies from Tye's music. In Cree and Wardell's 'Church Psalm Tunes,' 1851, an attempt was made to similarly arrange Tye's fifth tune, under the title of 'St. Cuthbert's,' and there is another in the 'Yattendon Hymnal.' The fourth was published in its original form, with slightly altered harmonies, as a Latin motet, 'Laudate nomen Domini,' in Webb's collection of madrigals and motets, 1808. This arrangement was reprinted in 'Zeitschrift für Deutschlands Musikvereine und Dilettanten,' Karlsruhe, 1842, and by Burns (with Tye's harmonies) in 1852; also by Novello, as 'O come ye servants of the Lord,' and by Curwen as 'Come let us join our cheerful songs,' and in a Welsh translation. No. 1 is in Burns's 'Anthems and Services,' as 'Come, Holy Ghost;' No. 2 in Turle and Taylor's 'People's Singing Book' and Warren's 'Chorister's Handbook;' No. 7, with Welsh words, in 'Anthemydd y Tonic Sol-fa,' and in 'Y Cerdor;' No. 8, in its complete form, in the 'Parish Choir,' vol. iii.; No. 9, in the 'Chorister's Handbook;' No. 14, with the original words, in Hawkins's 'History' and Gwilt's collection of madrigals; and all the first nine in 'Quarterly Musical Review' for October 1827. Complete reprints, with new words, were issued by Oliphant in 1837, by Burns in 'Sacred Music by Old Composers,' and by E. D. Cree. The use of two numbers of Oliphant's arrangement in Hulah's 'Part Music' made them for a time widely popular. Burney's statement that Tye's settings consist of 'fugues and canons of the most artificial and complicated kind' shows that he had not seen them, and judged the work from the specimen printed by Hawkins, which happens to be the most scientific, being a masterly double canon.

In 1569 appeared 'A Notable Historye of Nastagio and Traversari,' a rhymed version of a story from Boccaccio, by C. T., which is generally supposed to indicate Christopher Tye. J. P. Collier attributed the work to George Turbervillo [q. v.], but the latter's version is extant, and is quite different and much superior.

Six anthems by Tye—'I will exalt Thee,' 'Sing unto the Lord,' 'I lift my heart,' and the Deus Misereatur in three sections—were printed in Barnard's 'Selected Church Musick,' 1641. The first two are scored in Boyce's 'Cathedral Music.' Pago's 'Harmonia Sacra' contains 'From the depths,' which was reprinted by the Motet Society. Rimbault, in 'Cathedral Music,' printed an evening service from the Ely MSS.; no morning service by Tye is known.

Burney scored and published the Gloria of Tye's 'Euge bene' mass; Hullah reprinted it in his 'Vocal Scores,' and performed it at St. Martin's Hall. The entire mass was published by Mr. G. E. P. Arkwright in 1894.

Unpublished works by Tye are in manuscript at Buckingham Palace, the British Museum, at Oxford in the Bodleian Library, the Music School, and Christ Church, at Peterhouse, Cambridge, and the libraries of Ely and other cathedrals. They include a mass on the song 'Western Wind, why dost thou blow?' with the masses by John Shephard (f. 1550) and John Tavorner (f. 1530) on the same theme, in British Museum Addit. MS. 17802-6; another mass at Peterhouse; a Passion according to John, specimens of which were printed in the 'Overture,' May 1893, and about seventy other works, almost all sacred.

Tye's finest work is to be found in his 'Actes of the Apostles' and his anthems; in 'I will exalt Thee' and 'Sing unto the Lord' he produced compositions which remain as beautiful as when they were written. He succeeded in avoiding the harshnesses, especially the unpleasant false relations which mar very many of the best works in the polyphonic style. His mass, 'Euge bene,' though distinguished rather by scientific skill than expressive beauty (Kirchenmusikalisches Jahrbuch, Ratisbon, 1897), is a fine example of contrapuntal writing. Both protestant and catholic reformers had insisted on greater attention being paid by the composers of sacred music to distinctness of the words than had hitherto been the case; and the avoidance of needless complication which ensued was exactly what was required to perfect the polyphonic style. The music of Tavorner, Tye's senior by a very few years, is scarcely known even to antiquaries; but the anthems of Tye have always remained in use, and hymn-tunes founded on his 'Actes of the Apostles' are known throughout England and Scotland. Burney accurately wrote of Tye, 'Perhaps as good a poet as Stern-hold, and as great a musician as Europe could then boast.'

No personal memorial of Tye remains, except his autograph signature to some articles presented by Cox to the clergy of Ely. It is facsimiled in Arkwright's edition of the Mass 'Euge bene.'

[The biographical notice prefixed to G. E. P. Arkwright's edition of the mass 'Euge bene' contains all the known facts concerning Tye and his family, with full extracts from documents and a list of compositions complete except five pieces in Baldwin's MS. at Buckingham Palace. See also Wood's Fasti Oxonienses, col. 799; War-ton's Hist. of English Poetry, sect. 47, 60; Cooper's Athenae Cantabrigienses, i. 309, 569; Hawkins's Hist. of Music, c. 95; Burney's Hist. ii. 564-6, 589, iii. 10-13; Grove's Dict. of Music and Musicians, i. 70, iii. 272, iv. 196, 474, 805; Nagels Geschichte der Musik in England, ii. 61; Davey's Hist. of English Music, pp. 140, 144.] H. D.

TYERMAN, DANIEL (1778-1828), missionary, was born on 19 Nov. 1778 at Clack farm, near Osmothorpe in Yorkshire, where his parents had resided for some time. In 1790 he obtained employment in London. Coming under strong religious convictions, he entered Notton Academy in 1795 to prepare himself for the congregational ministry. In 1798 he became minister at Cawsand in Cornwall, and thence removed to Wellington in Somerset. About 1801 he officiated for a short time at Southampton, and afterwards settled at Newport in the Isle of Wight. There he was one of the first projectors of the town reading-rooms, and filled the office of secretary of the Isle of Wight Bible Society. In 1821 Tyerman and George Bannet of Shosfield were appointed by the London Missionary Society to visit their southern stations. They sailed from London on 2 May in the whaler Tuscan, and, proceeding round Cape Horn, visited Tahiti, the Leeward and Sandwich Islands, and other mission stations in the South Seas. In 1821 they visited New South Wales, and on the way narrowly escaped from the Maoris of New Zealand. From Sydney, in September 1824, they sailed through the Torres Straits to Java, and thence to Singapore, Canton, and Calcutta. At Serampore, on 3 May 1826, they met the venerable William Carey (1761-1834) [q. v.], who received them with much kindness. After visiting Benares, they sailed to Madras, and thence to Goa. From India they voyaged in 1827 to Mauritius and Madagascar, where the missions were firmly established under King Radama. On 30 July 1828 Tyerman, whose health had given way under the climate of southern India, died at Antananarivo. He was twice married: first, in 1793, to Miss Rich, by whom he had a son and daughter; and, secondly, in 1810, to Miss Fletcher of Abingdon, by whom he had two sons and a daughter.

Tyerman was the author of: 1. 'An Essay on Baptism,' Newport, 1806, 12mo; 2nd edit. London, 1814, 12mo. 2. 'Evangelical Hope: an Essay,' London, 1815, 12mo. 3. 'The Dairyman: the Life of Joseph Wallbridge,' Newport, 1816, 12mo. 4. 'Essay on the Wisdom of God,' London, 1818, 8vo. The journal of his missionary tour was published by James Montgomery, the poet, in 1831, London, 8vo (2nd edit. 1841). The first part was written in conjunction with George Bennet, but the latter part was entirely his own. It affords a graphic picture of the state of the London society's missions at the period.

[Journal of Voyages and Travels by Tyerman and Bennet (with portrait), 1811; Congregational Mag. 1833, pp. 468, 513.] E. I. O.

TYERS, JONATHAN (d. 1767), proprietor of Vauxhall Gardens, first comes into notice in 1728, when he obtained from Elizabeth Masters a lease of the Spring Gardens at Vauxhall (Vauxhall Gardens) at an annual rent of 250*l*. He ultimately became the owner of the gardens by purchasing a portion in 1752 for 3,800*l*. of George Doddington, and the remainder about 1768. Tyers first opened the gardens on 7 June 1732 with a ridotto al fresco. He greatly altered and improved the gardens, erected an orchestra, and in 1745 added vocal music to the instrumental concerts. The place enjoyed the patronage of Frederick, prince of Wales, and soon became fashionable. Tyers did not a little to reform the morale of the Spring Gardens, which had been (since about 1661) a pleasure resort of the Restoration type. He issued to regular subscribers silver admission tickets, designed by his friend Hogarth, probably when living at his summer lodgings in South Lambeth. Hogarth is said to have suggested the adornment of the supper boxes with paintings [see HAYMAN, FRANÇOIS], and, in return for services connected with the gardens, Tyers presented him with a gold ticket, which served as a perpetual free pass to the entertainments.

Tyers was an enterprising and prosperous manager, though of a somewhat querulous disposition. The diminutive size of the chickens and the thinness of the slices of the ham and beef supplied to his patrons became proverbial, and he is said to have engaged a carver who promised to slice a ham so as to cover the whole garden like a carpet. Fielding, in his 'Amelia,' pays a tribute to the 'truly elegant taste' and the 'excellency of heart' of Jonathan Tyers.

In 1734 Tyers had purchased Denbies, a farmhouse and grounds near Dorking. He altered the house, and in a wood adjoining erected a temple abounding with serious inscriptions, as well as another building with figures of a Christian and an unbeliever in their last moments, and a statue of Truth treading on a mask. In spite of these lugubrious reminders, this 'master-builder of Delight' retained his love for Vauxhall till the last, and just before his death had himself carried into 'The Grove' to take a farewell look at the Spring Gardens. Tyers died at his house at the gardens on 1 July 1767 (Gent. Mag. 1767, p. 383). Denbies was purchased of his heirs by the Hon. Peter King, who did away, we are told, with Tyers's 'grave conceits.'

A rare print of the Spring Gardens, engraved by Romano and published by G. Bickham in May 1744, shows Tyers grumbling at his check-taker, and a group of the frequenters of the gardens, including John Lockman [q. v.], the poet of the place. A portrait of Tyers, painted by Louis Joseph Watteau, was in 1855 in the possession of Frederick Gye (Numismatic Chronicle, 1856, vol. xviii).

Tyers left a widow and two daughters, Margaret, married to George Rogers of Southampton, and Elizabeth. He was succeeded at Vauxhall by his two sons, Thomas [see TYERS, THOMAS] and Jonathan. The latter was sole manager of Vauxhall from 1786 till his death in 1792, when his place as manager was taken by his son-in-law, Bryant Barrett (d. 1809).

[Manning and Bray's Surrey, i. 563; Brayley and Mantell's Surrey, v. 90 ff.; Allen's Lambeth, pp. 358 ff.; Angelo's Reminiscences, 1828, i. 151-153; Wroth's London Pleasure Gardens.]

W. W.

TYERS, THOMAS (1726-1787), author, born in 1726, was the eldest son of Jonathan Tyers [q. v.], proprietor of Vauxhall Gardens. He matriculated at Pembroke College, Oxford, on 13 Dec. 1738; graduated B.A. 1742, and M.A. (from Exeter College) 1745 (FOSTER, Alumni Oxon.). He was admitted barrister-at-law of the Inner Temple in 1767, and on his father's death in 1767 became joint manager of Vauxhall Gardens with his brother Jonathan. He furnished the words of many songs sung at Vauxhall, and contributed an account of the gardens to Nichols's 'History of Lambeth.'

His father had left him well off, and he was too vivacious and eccentric to confine himself to the law. 'He therefore,' says Boswell (Life of Johnson, 1788), 'ran about the world with a pleasant carelessness, amusing everybody by his desultory conversation and abundance of good-natured anecdotes. He was a great favourite with Dr. Johnson, who used to call him Tom Tyers. Johnson has described him in the 'Idler' (1759, No. 48) as 'Tom Rostless,' the 'ambulatory' student who devoted little time to books, but wandered about for ideas to the coffee-house and debating club. Tyers was in reality a considerable reader, and Johnson confessed that Tyers always told him something that he did not know before; it was he who said of Johnson that he always talked as if he were talking upon oath.

Tyers had a villa at Ashtoad, near Epsom, and apartments in Southampton Street, Covent Garden, and he used to drive backwards and forwards: 'just as the humour hits, I'm there or here.' In a character sketch, supposed to be by himself, he is described as 'inquisitive, talkative, full of notions and quotations, and, which is the praise of a purling stream, of no great depth.' He had some knowledge of medicine, and rather posed as a valetudinarian.

Tyers sold his share in the Vauxhall Gardens in 1785, leaving the management to his brother Jonathan. He died at Ashtoad, after a lingering illness, on 1 Feb. 1787, in his sixty-first year. He was unmarried.

A good likeness of him was drawn by I. Taylor and engraved by J. Hall.

Tyers was a timid and dilettante author. Of his essay on Addison (see below) he at first printed only fifty copies, and distributed the twenty-five copies of 'Conversations, Political and Familiar,' with the request that 'this pamphlet may not be lent. A very few copies are printed for the perusal of a very few friends.' His 'Political Conferences,' imaginary conversations between statesmen, had not a little repute in its day, and his essays on Pope, Addison, and Johnson contain some curious anecdotes.

His publications are: 1. 'Political Conferences between several great men in the last and present century,' 1780, 8vo; 2nd edit. 1781. 2. 'An Historical Rhapsody on Mr. Pope,' 1781 (cf. Notes and Queries, 3rd ser. viii. 456); 2nd edit. 1782: each edition of 250 copies. 3. 'An Historical Essay on Mr. Addison,' 1782, fifty copies; 1783, one hundred copies. 4. 'Conversations, Political and Familiar,' 1781, 8vo, twenty-five copies. 5. 'A Biographical Sketch of Dr. Johnson,' (published in 'Gentleman's Magazine,' 1785, liv. 899, 982).

[Obituary in the London Chronicle for 1-2 Feb. 1787; Boswell's Johnson, ed. G. B. Hill, ii. 414, iii. 308-9; Nichol's Literary Anecdotes, viii. 79 ff.; Brit. Mus. Cat.] W. W.

TYLDEN, SIR JOHN MAXWELL (1787-1866), lieutenant-colonel, born on 25 Sept. 1787, was the eldest son of Richard Tylden of Milsted, Kent, by his second wife, Jane, daughter of Samuel Auchmuty, D.D., rector of New York, and sister of Lieutenant-general Sir Samuel Auchmuty [q. v.] William Burton Tylden [q. v.] was his younger brother. He was commissioned as ensign in the 43rd foot in the summer of 1804, and was promoted lieutenant on 23 Nov.

In 1807 he served in the expedition to Monte Video and Buenos Ayres as brigade major to his uncle, Sir Samuel Auchmuty [q. v.] He became captain on 28 Sept. 1809. In 1810 he went to Madras as aide-de-camp to Auchmuty. He accompanied him to Java, was present at the capture of Fort Cornelis, 26 Aug. 1811, and was sent home with despatches. He received a brevet majority, and was knighted in 1812, when he acted as proxy for Auchmuty at the installation of knights of the Bath.

He joined the 1st battalion of the 43rd in the Peninsula in 1813, and was present at the battles of the Nive, Orthes, and Toulouse. In 1814 he went with his regiment to America, and took part in the unsuccessful attack on New Orleans. In the later stages of it he acted as assistant adjutant-general, Colonel (Sir) Frederick Stovin [q. v.] having been wounded on 23 Dec., and he was praised in General Lambert's despatch of 28 Jan. 1815.

In February 1816 he obtained a majority in the 3rd buffs, and was placed on half-pay. On 16 July 1818 he became major in the 52nd, and on 12 Aug. 1819 he was made brevet lieutenant-colonel. He went to Nova Scotia in 1823 in temporary command of the 52nd, but returned to England on leave in the following year, and retired from the army in June 1825. He afterwards received the silver medal for Java, and for Nive, Orthes, and Toulouse.

He was one of the leaders of the liberal party in East Kent. He was J.P., and was made D.L. in 1852. He married, first, in 1829, Elizabeth, only daughter of the Rev. H. L. Walsh of Grimblesthorpe, Lincoln, by whom he had one daughter; secondly, in 1842, Charlotte, daughter of Sir Robert Syngé, bart. He died at Milsted on 18 May 1866.

[Gent. Mag. 1866, i. 928; Royal Military Calendar, v. 161; Ann. Reg. App. p. 149;

James's Military Occurrences between Great Britain and America, ii. 375; Mourson's History of the 52nd Regiment; Burke's Landed Gentry.] E. M. L.

TYLDEN, THOMAS (1624-1688), controversialist. [See GODDEN, THOMAS.]

TYLDEN, WILLIAM BURTON (1790-1854), colonial royal engineers and brigadier-general, son of Richard Tylden of Milsted Manor, Kent, by his second wife, Jane, daughter of the Rev. Dr. Samuel Auchmuty, was born at Milsted on 8 April 1790. Sir John Maxwell Tylden [q. v.] was his elder brother. After passing through the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich, Tylden received a commission as second lieutenant in the royal engineers on 6 Nov. 1806, and was promoted to be first lieutenant on 1 May 1807. He embarked for Gibraltar on 8 Jan. 1808, arriving on 10 March, and was employed in the revision of the fortifications. In September 1811 he went to Malta, and thence, at the end of October, to Messina. He was promoted to be second captain on 15 April 1812.

Tylden was commanding royal engineer, under Lord William Bentinck, at the siege of Santa Maria in the gulf of Spozzia, and at its capture on 29 March 1814, and was thanked in general orders for his exertions. He was mentioned in despatches (London Gazette, 8 May 1814), and Admiral Rowley expressed his indebtedness to him for assistance to the navy at the batteries. Tylden was also commanding royal engineer of the Anglo-Sicilian army under Bentinck at the action before Genoa on 17 April, when the French were defeated, and he took part in the investment of the city and the operations which led to the surrender of the fortress on 19 April 1814. He was thanked in general orders, mentioned in despatches (London Gazette, 8 May 1814), and on 25 June received promotion for his services to the brevet rank of major. He was also appointed military secretary to Bentinck, commander-in-chief in the Mediterranean, and occupied the post until his return to England in August.

In November 1814 Tylden joined the army in the Netherlands, and took charge of the defences of Antwerp. In 1815 he organised and commanded a train of eighty pontoons, with which he took part in the operations of the allies, the march to and capture of Paris, and the occupation of France. He returned to England in 1818. In June 1822 he went again to Gibraltar, and served there as second in command of the royal engineers until May 1823, when he returned to England, and was stationed at Portsmouth. He was promoted to be first captain in the royal engineers on 23 March 1825. In November 1830 he was appointed commanding royal engineer at Bermuda. He returned home in July 1836, and was commanding royal engineer of the eastern military district, with headquarters at Harwich. He was promoted to be lieutenant-colonel of royal engineers on 10 Jan. 1837. In May 1840 he went to Malta as commanding royal engineer, returning to England in October 1844, when he was appointed commanding royal engineer of the south-eastern military district and stationed at Dover. He was promoted to be colonel of royal engineers on 21 Sept. 1850, having arrived at Corfu in June of that year as commanding royal engineer in the Ionian Islands.

From Corfu Tylden was sent in February 1854 to join the army in the east. He arrived at Constantinople on the 12th of that month, and on the 21st was made a brigadier-general on Lord Raglan's staff and commanding royal engineer of the army. He was busy until May with the defences of the lines of Gallipoli. On the change of base from Gallipoli to Varna, Tylden went to Varna, and when the Russians raised the siege of Silistria in the middle of June, and it was decided to invade the Crimea, he prepared the necessary works for embarking and disembarking the army and its munitions of war, and collected siege materials. On the occasion of the great fire at Varna on 10 Aug., Tylden was chiefly instrumental in saving the town from entire destruction by protecting two large gunpowder magazines with wet blankets when the fire had reached within thirty yards of them.

Tylden proceeded to the Crimea with the army, and took part in the battle of the Alma on 20 Sept. 1854. Lord Raglan in his despatch referred to him as being 'always at hand to carry out any service I might direct him to undertake.' He was taken ill with virulent cholera on the night of 21 Sept., and died on the evening of the 22nd. He was buried in a vineyard before the army marched on the morning of the 23rd. In the orders issued on the occasion it was stated that 'no officer was ever more regretted, and deservedly so.' It was announced in the 'London Gazette' of 5 July 1855 that, had Tylden survived, he would have been made a knight commander of the Bath, and in the 'Gazette' of 8 Sept. 1856 his widow was authorised to bear the same style as if her husband had been duly invested with the insignia.

Tylden married first, at Harrietsham, Kent, on 20 Aug. 1817, Cecilia, eldest daughter of William Baldwin of Stedehill, Kent; and secondly, at Dover on 20 Feb. 1851, Mary, widow of Captain J. H. Baldwin, and eldest daughter of the Rev. S. Dineley Goodyar, rector of Otterdon, Kent. He had two sons by his first wife—William, curate of Stanford, Kent, and

RICHARD TYLDEN (1819-1855), born at Stede Hill, Kent, on 22 Nov. 1819. After passing through the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich, he received a commission as second lieutenant in the royal engineers on 14 Dec. 1837, and was promoted first lieutenant on 19 March 1840 and second captain on 9 Nov. 1846; in February 1848 he went to the Cape of Good Hope. On the outbreak of the Kaffir war Sir Harry Smith gave Tylden the command of the extensive frontier district of North Victoria, with his headquarters at Whittlesea. The only force he had with which to protect this large territory consisted of a small detachment of sappers and miners, who had been employed under him in surveying operations, about twenty mounted burghers, and between two and three hundred Fingoes. With this small force Tylden attacked and completely routed a body of two thousand Kaffirs under the chief Sandili. In general orders of 8 April 1852 it was stated that the exertions of Tylden and the burghers in this and similar affairs had been most conspicuous. Tylden was further mentioned both in general orders and in despatches by Sir Harry Smith's successor, Lieutenant-general Hon. George Cathcart. He was promoted to be brevet major for his services on 31 May 1853. Returning home in 1854, Tylden proceeded almost at once to Varna to serve on his father's staff as brigade major of engineers. He went with the army to the Crimea, took part in the battle of the Alma on 20 Sept., and was with his father when he died on 22 Sept. On arrival before Sebastopol he resigned his staff appointment to shave the more arduous and dangerous duties of the trenches, and on 20 Oct. was given the command of the British right attack. From that time until he received his mortal wound he was never absent from his duty in the trenches, and was in every skirmish and sortie that took place near his batteries. On 12 Dec. 1854 he was promoted to be brevet lieutenant-colonel for distinguished service. In the attack and capture of the enemy's rifle-pits on 19 April 1855 Tylden distinguished himself by his gallantry, and was mentioned in despatches. On 7 June he commanded the royal engineers and sappers and miners in the attack on the 'Quarries,' when Captain (afterwards Viscount) Wolseley served under him as an assistant engineer. Tylden was in command of the royal engineers and sappers and miners of No. 2 column in the unfortunate attack on the Redan on 18 June, when he was struck down by grape-shot. For his services at the rifle-pits, at the 'Quarries,' and at the Redan, he was on 3 July appointed aide-de-camp to the queen and promoted to be colonel in the army, and on 5 July he was made a companion of the Bath, military division. At the Redan he was severely wounded in both legs. His wounds were progressing favourably, and he was on his way to Malta, when he was attacked by diarrhoea, and died on 2 Aug. 1855, the day after his arrival at Malta, where he was buried.

[Despatches; War Office Records; Royal Engineers' Records; Gent. Mag. 1853, 1855; United Service Journal, 1851, 1855; Illustrated London News, 16 Dec. 1854 (with portrait of General Tylden); Conolly's History of the Royal Sappers and Minors; Porter's History of the Corps of Royal Engineers; Kinglake's Invasion of the Crimea; Morning Chronicle (London), 16 Aug. 1855; Times (London), 23 April 1851; Holloway's Journal of the Siege of Gibraltar; Theatrical South Africa; King's Campaigning in Kaffirland.]

R. H. V.

TYLDESLEY, SIR THOMAS (1596-1651), royalist general, born in 1596, was the elder son of Edward Tyldesley of Morleys Hall, Astley, in the parish of Leigh, Lancashire, by his wife Elizabeth, daughter of Christopher Preston of Holker. In early life he adopted the military profession and served in the wars in Germany. At the time of the outbreak of the civil war Tyldesley was living at Myerscough Lodge, one of the estates inherited from his father, and, when war seemed unavoidable, was one of the first to whom James Stanley, lord Strange (afterwards seventh Earl of Derby) [q. v.], looked for help. His father was at one time steward of the household of Ferdinando Stanley, fifth earl of Derby, uncle of Lord Strange. At his own charge Tyldesley raised regiments of horse, foot, and dragoons, in command of which he served with distinction at the battle of Edgehill. His next notable exploit was the storming of the town of Burton-upon-Trent. For his conduct he received from the king the honour of knighthood and was made a brigadier. In May 1644 he commanded under the Earl of Derby at the siege of Bolton, when, after a hot engagement, they captured the town. He was appointed governor of Lichfield in 1645, and surrendered the place in obedience to the royal warrant on 10 July 1648. He was afterwards in command of a division of the army besieging Lancaster with the expectation of a quick surrender of the place when the royal forces were totally defeated at Preston on 17 Aug. 1648. Obligated to retreat to the north, Tyldesley joined others of the royalists at Appleby. Colonel-general Ashton, having relieved Cockermouth Castle, marched against them. Sir Philip Musgrave [q. v.], the governor, and Tyldesley, finding defence impossible, surrendered at once on 9 Oct. 1648, on terms which required the officers to go beyond the seas within six months, and to observe meanwhile all orders and ordinances of parliament.

After the king's death in the following January, Tyldesley, unwilling to make any composition, passed over to Ireland, joining the Marquis of Ormonde; but the jealousy of the Irish officers soon obliged him to retire. He had a hearty welcome from his old commander and friend, Derby, in the Isle of Man late in 1649, and, after an expedition to Scotland, returned to the island to assist in taking over the troops to join Charles II in his advance into England. The king sent word for them to hasten to him in the summer of 1661, when he was actually quartered at Myerscough Lodge, Tyldesley's home. Although delayed by contrary winds, Derby, with Tyldesley as his major-general, landed at Wyre Water in Lancashire on 16 Aug., and called upon their friends, including both papists and presbyterians, to meet them at Preston. Before they could gather and equip an efficient force, Colonel Robert Lilburne, one of the parliament's officers, advanced against them with some well-trained troops and brought them to an engagement at Wigan Lane in Lancashire on 25 Aug. 1661. In that desperate struggle the royal army, which lost nearly half its officers and men, was totally defeated and Tyldesley was killed.

Tyldesley was buried in his own chapel of St. Nicholas in the church of Leigh, where a monument covers his remains. The Earl of Derby, who grieved much at the loss of his old companion-in-arms when himself on his way to his execution at Bolton two months later, requested in vain to be allowed to go into the church as he passed by Leigh to look upon his friend's grave. No forfeiture is known to have followed Tyldesley's decease as far as related to his Astley and Tyldesley estates. A monument, of which there is an engraving in Baines's 'History of Lancashire,' was erected in the hedge by the roadside half a mile from Wigan, where Tyldesley fell, by Alexander Rigby, high sheriff of the county, who had served under him as cornet. There is a fine portrait of Tyldesley at Ilulton Park, near Bolton, which is engraved by J. Cochran in Baines's 'Lancashire' (iii. 610). Another portrait, engraved by William Nelson Gardiner, was published in 1816.

About 1684 he married Frances, elder daughter of Ralph Standish of Standish, by whom he had three sons and seven daughters. His eldest son, Edward, joined the Jacobite rebels under Lord Derwentwater in 1715, and was captured at Preston, but was acquitted on his trial.

[Ormerod's Lancashire Civil War Tracts (Chetham Soc.); Raines's Stanley Papers (Chetham Soc.), ii. i. and ii. The notice of Tyldesley in Baines's Lancashire is inaccurate.]

A. N.

TYLER, SIR CHARLES (1760-1835), admiral, born in 1760, son of Peter Tyler, a captain in the 52nd regiment, by his wife Anne, daughter of Henry, eighth lord Teynham, entered the navy in 1771, and was borne for a few months on the books of the Barfleur, guardship at Chatham, as servant of the captain, Andrew Snape Hamond [q. v.], with whom he afterwards was in the Arethusa, on the North American station. In 1774 he was moved into the Preston, the flagship of Vice-admiral Samuel Graves [q. v.], and afterwards carrying the broad pennant of Commodore William (afterwards Lord) Hotham [q. v.] In 1777 he was compelled to invalid in consequence of an injury to his left leg, as the result of which it was 'necessary to remove the small bone, so that for two years he was unable to move except on crutches,' and was left permanently lame (Memorial). On 5 April 1779 he was promoted to be lieutenant of the Culoden, in which he served in the Channel fleet till September 1780, and after that in the Britannia, the flagship of Vice-admiral Darby, till April 1782, and in the Edgar, again with Commodore Hotham, till the end of the war. He was promoted, July 1783, to be commander of the Chapman, armed ship, and from 1784 to 1789 commanded the Trimmer, stationed at Milford for the suppression of smuggling. In 1790 he commanded the Tisiphone, on similar service in the Channel, and on 21 Sept. 1790 was advanced to post rank. In March 1793 he was appointed to the Meleager frigate, in which he went out to the Mediterranean with Lord Hood; after the reduction of Calvi he was moved into the San Fiorenzo, one of the prizes; and in February 1795 to the Diadem of 64 guns, in which he took part in the desultory action of 14 March.

Shortly after this Tyler was concerned in a case of peculiar importance in the history of naval discipline. A detachment of the 11th regiment was serving on board the Diadem, in lieu of marines, and the officer in command of it, Lieutenant Fitzgerald, conceiving that he was independent of naval control, behaved with contempt to his superior officers. Tyler reported the case to the admiral, who ordered a court-martial. Fitzgerald denied the legality of the court, and refused to make any defence. The court overruled his objections, heard the evidence in support of the charge, and cashiered Fitzgerald. The Duke of York took the matter up, and issued an order to the effect that soldiers serving on board ships of war were subject to military rule only. The superior officers of the navy protested against this, not only as subversive of all discipline afloat, but as contrary to act of parliament; and eventually all the soldiers then serving in the fleet were disembarked, and their place filled by marines (МОРЯКИ, Principles and Practice of Courts-martial, 4th ed. i. 202).

During the latter part of 1796 and the first of 1798 the Diadem was frequently attached to the squadron under the orders of Nelson in the Gulf of Genoa, and on the coast of Italy. Later on Tyler was moved into the Aigle frigate, in which he captured several of the enemy's privateers in the Mediterranean and in the Channel; and on 18 July 1798, while seeking to join the squadron under Nelson, was wrecked near Tunis. In February 1799 he was appointed to the Warrior, one of the Channel fleet, and of the fleet which in 1801 went into the Baltic under the command of Sir Hyde Parker (1780-1807) [q. v.]. On returning from the Baltic, the Warrior was sent off Cadiz, and in January 1802 to the West Indies, one of a small squadron, under Tyler as senior officer, to watch the proceedings of the French expedition to St. Domingo. In July the Warrior returned to England, and was paid off. When the war broke out again, Tyler was appointed to the command of a district of sea fencibles. In February 1806 he commissioned the Tonnant of 80 guns for service in the Channel, but was afterwards sent to the fleet off Cadiz. On 21 Oct. he took part in the battle of Trafalgar, where the Tonnant was the fourth ship in the lee line, got early into action, and sustained a loss of men of twenty-six killed and fifty wounded. Tyler himself was severely wounded by a musket-ball in the right thigh, and, in accordance with the recommendation of the admiralty, he was granted a pension of £250l. (Admiralty Orders in Council, 20 Jan., 23 April 1806). He was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral on 28 April 1808, and in May hoisted his flag as second in command at Portsmouth. In June he was sent to Lieboon, and was there with Sir Charles Cotton [q. v.] in September to receive the surrender of the Russian fleet. From 1812 to 1815 he was commander-in-chief at the Cape of Good Hope, and his service ended with his return to England in March 1816. He was promoted to be vice-admiral on 4 Dec. 1813, and to be admiral on 27 May 1825. He was nominated a K.C.B. on 2 Jan. 1815, and a G.C.B. on 29 Jan. 1833. He died at Gloucester on 28 Sept. 1835. He was twice married, and left issue. Charles, a son by the first marriage, died a captain on the retired list of the navy in 1846.

SIR GEORGE TYLER (1792-1862), K.H., the eldest son by the second marriage, born in 1792, entered the navy in 1809; lost his right arm in a boat attack in Quiberon Bay in 1811; was his father's flag-lieutenant at the Cape of Good Hope; became a commander in 1815, and a captain in 1822. From 1833 to 1840 he was lieutenant-governor of the island of St. Vincent; was made a rear-admiral in 1852, a vice-admiral in 1857, and died in 1862. He was married, and left a large family.

[Marshall's Roy. Nav. Biogr. i. 372; O'Byrne's Nav. Biogr. Dict.; Service-book, passing certificate and Memorial (as in text) in the Public Record Office; Gent. Mag. 1835 ii. 649, 1862 ii. 116.] J. K. L.

TYLER, JAMES ENDELL (1789-1831), divine, born at Monmouth on 30 Jan. 1789, was the son of James Tyler, a solicitor in that town. He was educated at the grammar school in Monmouth, and matriculated from Oriel College, Oxford, on 29 Nov. 1805. While an undergraduate he was elected Michel scholar at Queen's College, and in 1812 obtained a fellowship at Oriel. He graduated B.A. on 7 Dec. 1809, M.A. on 9 Jan. 1813, and B.D. on 17 Dec. 1823. From 1818 to 1820 he filled the office of tutor at Oriel, holding also the perpetual curacy of Moreton Pinkney, Northamptonshire. In 1826 his preaching attracted the attention of Lord Liverpool, who presented him to the living of St. Giles-in-the-Fields. Two years later he relinquished his fellowship, and on 15 March 1845 Sir Robert Peel appointed him a residentiary canon of St. Paul's Cathedral. He was a man who inspired strong esteem. He was very popular at Oriel College, and in London his parishioners regarded him with much affection. Endell Street, Long Acre, was named after him at their instance, his modesty refusing to allow it to be called Tyler Street. He died in London on 5 Oct. 1851 at his house in Bedford Square. He married, first, on 18 April 1827, Elizabeth Ann, daughter of George Griffin of Newton House, Monmouth. She died on 26 Nov. 1830, leaving two sons—George Griffin and Edward James—and a daughter. He married, secondly, Jane, daughter of David Robertson of Bedford Square, by whom he had a son and two daughters.

Besides single sermons, Tyler was the author of: 1. 'Oaths: their Origin, Nature, and History,' London, 1834, 8vo; 2nd edit. London, 1835, 8vo. 2. 'Henry of Monmouth: Memoirs of the Life and Character of Henry V,' London, 1838, 8vo. 3. 'Primitive Christian Worship,' London, 1840, 8vo. 4. 'A Father's Letters to his Son on the Apostolic Rite of Confirmation,' London, 1843, 8vo. 5. 'The Worship of the Blessed Virgin Mary contrary to Holy Scripture and to the Faith and Practice of the Church of Christ during the first five Centuries,' London, 1844, 8vo. 6. 'The Image Worship of the Church of Rome proved to be contrary to Holy Scripture and to the Faith and Discipline of the Primitive Church,' London, 1847, 8vo. 7. 'Meditations from the Fathers of the first five Centuries,' London, 1849, 16mo. 8. 'The Christian's Hope in Death,' London, 1852, 8vo.

[Mozley's Reminiscences of Oriel College, 1882, i. 81–8, 93–4; Foster's Alumni Oxon. 1715–1886; Genl. Mag. 1852, i. 194.] E. I. C.

TYLER, TEGHELER, or HEBLEN, WALTER or WAT (d. 1381), rebel, had no real surname, all the above designations referring to his trade, which was that of covering roofs with tiles. There were several others of his calling among the ringleaders of the peasants' revolt of 1381, one, it is said, of the same christian name, and some confusion has resulted. He is usually credited, for instance, with having given the signal for the rising in Kent by killing a collector of the poll-tax who insulted his daughter, but John Stow (p. 284), who is the only authority for the incident, following a St. Albans chronicle (apparently now lost), carefully distinguishes the John Tyler of Dartford, who committed this deed, from Wat Tyler, who belonged to Maidstone. The rolls of parliament (iii. 175) describe Wat vaguely as 'of the county of Kent.' More than one place in Kent claims to be his birthplace (HASTED, ii. 224; Archæologia Cantiana, xiii. 139). Walter Tyler 'of Essex,' who was presented by a Kentish jury as one of the two leaders of the rioters at Canterbury on Monday, 10 June, must, if correctly described, be a different person (ib. iii. 98). But the recently discovered Stowe manuscript states that after holding council at Dartford the rebels took Rochester Castle on 7 June, and, choosing Wat Tyler of Maidstone to be their captain, were led by him to Canterbury. Possibly the East Kent juries laboured under a mistaken impression that he came from Essex.

Little is recorded of Tyler's conduct during the conflagrations and murders in London on 13 and 14 June, but he clearly assumed the chief place among the leaders of the rebels. A proclamation in Thanet church on the 13th ran in the names of Wat Tyler and John Rackstraw, but the St. Albans insurgents who reached London on Friday the 14th were divided as to which was the more powerful person in the realm, the king or Tyler, and obtained from the latter a promise to come and 'shave the beards of the abbot, prior, and monks,' stipulating for implicit obedience to his orders (ib. iii. 76; WALSINGHAM, i. 468–9; RUSSELL, p. 10). Froissart ascribes the slaying of the notorious financier and forestaller Richard Lyons, condemned by the Good parliament but pardoned by the influence of John of Gaunt, to the private revenge of Tyler, who, he says, had been Lyons's servant in France and been beaten by him. But this seems most improbable. The Stowe manuscript (p. 517) is the only authority which brings Tyler to the interview between the king and the Essex insurgents at Mile End on the Friday morning, making him present their demands, including one, not elsewhere mentioned, for permission to seize the 'traitors' to the realm. This Richard granted on condition that their treason should be legally established, whereupon Tyler and his followers rushed off to the Tower to take the archbishop. In any case, Tyler and the Kentish men remained in London over the Friday night, while most of the Essex villains went home with a promise of charters of manumission. On the Saturday morning, 16 June, fresh outrages were committed, and Richard, after a visit to the abbey at three in the afternoon for solemn prayer, issued a proclamation summoning all the commons in the city to meet him in Smithfield outside the north-western gate. The accounts we have of what took place there vary considerably, and most of them are obviously coloured by violent hostility to the insurgents. Some exaggeration may be suspected in Walsingham's story (i. 464) that Tyler's real object was to put off the king until the next day, and in the night sack London, killing Richard and his chief supporters, and firing the city in four places; and that he demanded a commission for himself and his followers to behead all lawyers, escheators, and every one connected with the law. He is reported on the same authority to have boasted that within four days all the laws in England should proceed from his mouth. The fullest and most impartial account of the whole scene at Smithfield is supplied by the Stowe manuscript (pp. 519-22). Summoned by Walworth, the mayor, to speak to the king, Tyler rode up on a small horse, dismounted holding a dagger, and, half kneeling, shook Richard heartily by the hand, bidding him be of good cheer, for he should shortly be far more popular with the commons than he was at present. 'We shall be good comrades,' he added familiarly. Asked why he did not return to his country, he replied with a great oath that none of them would do so until they got a charter redressing their grievances, and it would be the worse for the lords of the realm if they were refused this. At the king's request Tyler rehearsed their demands, which were that there should be no law but the 'law of Winchester,' and no out-lawry; that no lord should henceforth exercise seignior; that there should be only one bishop in England, and that the goods of holy church and the monastic foundations should, after suitable provision for the clergy and monks, be divided among the parishioners; and, lastly, that there should be no villenage in England, but all to be free and 'of one condition.' Richard promised everything consistent with the 'regality of his crown,' and urged him to go home. Tyler, whose oratory had heated him, called for beer, and, drinking a great draught in the king's presence, remounted his horse. But an incautious remark by a 'valet of Kent' in the king's suite, that he recognised in the rebel leader the greatest thief and robber in that county, was overheard by Tyler, who ordered one of his followers to come and behead him. The man, who is identified by other chronicles with Sir John Newentone, keeper of Rochester Castle, boldly maintained the truth of what he had said, and Tyler, in his exasperation, was about to kill him with his own dagger when Walworth interfered and arrested him. Tyler thereupon struck at the mayor, who was saved by his armour, and instantly drew his sword and wounded Tyler in the neck and head. A follower of the king's, said by Froissart and the Continuator of Knighton to have been Ralph Standish, who was knighted immediately after, followed up the attack and inflicted a mortal wound (cf. Cal. Rot. Pat. ii. 32, 47; Baines, iii. 504). Tyler spurred his horse, calling upon the commons to avenge him, but after covering about thirty yards fell from his saddle half dead. His followers carried him into the adjoining hospital of St. Bartholemew, where he was laid in the master's chamber; but Walworth, returning to Smithfield after rousing the city for the king's protection, finding his body gone, and learning where he had been taken, had him brought out and beheaded. His head was carried on a pole to intimidate the commons, and afterwards, with that of the other chief ringleader, Jack Straw (P. John Rastrelstraw), replaced those of Archbishop Sudbury and their other victims on London Bridge.

[The most detailed and on the whole, in the present writer's judgment, most trustworthy contemporary account of the insurrection in London, and its antecedents in Kent and Essex, is that contained in an 'anomalous chronicle' once belonging to St. Mary's Abbey at York, used by Stow in his Annals of England; a late sixteenth-century transcript of this portion of the Chronicle, the original of which is not known to exist, is the Stowe MS. 1047, formerly in the Marquis of Buckingham's library at Stowe and now in the British Museum; it was first printed (by Mr. G. M. Trevelyan) in the English Historical Review for July 1898. It was written in French, with some admixture of English words, apparently in the north of England; some of the details, which do not occur in any other chronicle, are confirmed by documentary evidence. Stow's extracts do not include some of the most interesting passages. Walsingham's Historia Anglicana (Rolls Ser.) is full but prejudiced, and there is a brief but well-informed account by John Malverne (having some points in common with the Stowe MS.) printed at the end of the Polychronicon in the same series, and a less important one in the Monk of Evesham's Chronicle, edited by Hearne. Froissart (ed. Lucas, vol. x.) had good information, but did not use it very well; Riley, in his Memorials of London (p. 450), prints a narrative from the Lettre Books of the Corporation; some details may be added from the continuations of Knighton and the Eulogium Historiarum, both in the Rolls Ser.; Rotuli Parliamentorum; Cal. Pat. Rolls, Richard II, vols. i. and ii., 1295-7; Archæologia Cantiana, vol. iii.; Stowe's Chronicles, ed. Howes, 1691. The fullest modern account of the revolt is Le Soulèvement des Travaillleurs d'Anglottes en 1381, par André Révillat et Ch. Petit-Dutaillis, Paris, 1898, but its authors were unaware of the existence of the Stowe manuscript; other accounts in Stubbs's Constitutional History, vol. ii., and Wallon's Richard II; compare also Powell's Rising in East Anglia in 1381, Cambridge, 1896; Baines's History of Lancashire.] J. T. x.

TYLER, WILLIAM (d. 1801), sculptor and architect, was a contributor to the exhibition of the Society of Artists during the first eight years of its existence, sending in 1780 a design for a memorial to General Wolfe, and subsequently busts and monumental tablets. When the society was incorporated in 1795 he became a director. On the foundation of the Royal Academy in 1768 Tyler was nominated one of the original forty members, and he afterwards held the post of auditor. In that capacity he in 1799, with George Dance (1741-1825) [q.v.], drew up a report on the financial position of the institution, in acknowledgment of which service he was presented with a silver cup. Tyler practised architecture as well as sculpture, but displayed no great ability in either art. The Freemasons' Tavern was erected by him in 1786. He exhibited annually at the academy from 1789 to 1786, and once more in 1800, when he sent his design for a villa built at Kensington for the Duchess of Gloucester. He died at his house in Caroline Street, Bedford Square, London, on 6 Sept. 1801.

[Sandby's Hist. of the Royal Academy; Redgrave's Dict. of Artists; Exhibition Catalogues.]
F. M. O'D.

TYLOR, ALFRED (1824-1884), geologist, born on 26 Jan. 1824, was the second son of Joseph Tylor, brassfounder, by his wife, Harriet Skipper. His parents being members of the Society of Friends, he was educated in schools belonging to that denomination near London. Although his own inclinations were towards scientific study, the early death of his father compelled him to devote himself to his business, which he entered in his sixteenth year. Still, he gave every spare moment to study, even attaching himself to St. Bartholomew's Hospital to improve his knowledge of anatomy. He frequently visited the continent, going as far as Italy, Spain, and even Russia, both for business and for scientific purposes, in the latter case not seldom in company with eminent contemporary geologists. During the latter part of his life he lived at Carshalton. He died on 31 Dec. 1881, on his return from a visit to America. In 1860 he married Isabella Harris of Stoke Newington, who survived him with two sons and four daughters.

Tylor paid especial attention to the closing chapter of geological history, devoting to its consideration the majority of the thirteen papers which stand under his name in the Royal Society's catalogue. He maintained that the so-called glacial period was followed by one of exceptional rainfall, for which he proposed the name of pluvial. In his main contention he was right, though whether the precipitation was great enough to merit a special name is open to question. But he was, as his work indicates, a very shrewd and careful observer.

His chief books were: 1. 'On Changes of Sea Level,' London, 1853, 8vo. 2. 'Education and Manufactures,' London, 1863, 8vo (reprinted from a report connected with the exhibition of 1851, where he was a juror). 3. 'Colouration in Animals and Plants,' ed. S. B. J. Skerckhly, London, 1886, 8vo.

[Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc. 1882, xli. (Proc. p. 42); Geol. Mag. 1882, p. 142; information from Professor E. B. Tylor (brother) and other members of the family.] T. G. B.

TYMME, THOMAS (d. 1620), translator and author, seems to have been educated at Cambridge, possibly at Pembroke Hall, under Edmund Grindal [q.v.], afterwards archbishop of Canterbury. In 1577 he referred to 'the benefites which long ago in Cambridge and els where since I have receiued by your Grace's preferment' (Commentarie upon St. Pauls Epistles to the Corinthians, pref.) He did not, however, graduate, and is not mentioned in Cooper's 'Athenæ.' On 22 Oct. 1566 he was presented to the rectory of St. Antholin, Budge Row, London, and in 1575 he became rector of Hasketon, near Woodbridge, Suffolk (Davy's 'Suffolk Collections' in Addit. MS. 19165, f. 153). He appears to have held the rectory of St. Antholin until 12 Oct. 1592, when Nicholas Felton [q.v.], afterwards bishop of Ely, was appointed his successor (HENNESSY, Novum Repertorium, p. 302). In 1570 he published his first work, a translation from the Latin of John Brentius, entitled 'Newes from Ninive to Englands' (London, 8vo). It was followed in 1574 by a more important work, the translation of P. de la Hamée's history of the civil wars in France, entitled 'The Three Partes of Commentaries containing the whole and perfect Discourse of the Civill Warres of France under the Raignes of Henry the Second, Frances the Second, and of Charles the Ninth' (London, 4to); prefixed is a long copy of verses in Tymme's praise by Edward Grant [q.v.], headmaster of Westminster school. From this time Tymme produced numerous translations, chiefly of theological works. He secured patronage in high quarters, among those to whom his books were dedicated being Thomas Radcliffe, earl of Sussex, Charles Blount, earl of Devonshire, Ambrose Dudley, earl of Warwick, Archbishop Grindal, Sir Edward Coke, chief-justice, and Sir John Puckering, lord-keeper. He died at Hasketon in April 1620, being buried there on the 29th.

Tymme married, at Hasketon, on 17 July 1615, Mary Hendy, who died in 1657, leaving one son, Thomas Tymme, who graduated M.D. at Cambridge on 3 July 1647, was admitted honorary fellow of the Royal College of Physicians in December 1664, and died in 1687 (Addit. MS. 19165, f. 153; Munk, Coll. of Phys. i. 334). By a deed dated 22 Sept. 1614 the elder Tymme gave eighteen acres of land in Hasketon for the maintenance of two poor parishioners. William Tymme, possibly a brother of Thomas, printed many books between 1601 and 1615 (ABBER, Stationer's Reg.)

Besides the works mentioned above, Tymme published: 1. 'A Catholike and Ecclesiasticall Exposition of the Holy Gospell after S. John . . . gathered by A[ugustine] Marlorat, and translated by T. Tymme,' London, 1575, 4to. 2. 'A Commentarie upon S. Pauls Epistles to the Corinthians, written by John Calvin, and translated out of the Latin,' London, 1577, 4to. 3. 'A Commentarie of John Caluin upon Genesis . . . translated out of the Latin,' London, 1578, 4to. 4. 'A Catholike and Ecclesiasticall Exposition of the Holy Gospel after S. Mark and Luke, gathered . . . by Augustine Marlorat, and translated out of Latin,' London, 1583, 4to. 5. 'The Figure of Antichriste . . . disciphered by a Catholike . . . Exposition of the Second Epistle to the Thessalonians,' London, 1580, 8vo. 6. 'A Discoverie of Ten English Lepers [i.e. the Schismatic, Murderer, &c.] . . . setting before our Eyes the Iniquitie of those Latter Daies,' London, 1592, 4to. 7. 'A Briefe Description of Hierusalem . . . translated out of the Latin [of S. Adrichomius],' London, 1595, 4to; other editions, 1654, 4to, and 1660, 8vo. 8. 'The Poore Mans Paternoster . . . newly imprinted,' London, 1598, 16mo. 9. 'The Practice of Chymicall and Hermeticall Physicke . . . written in Latin by Josephus Quorsitanus, and translated . . .,' London, 1605, 4to. 10. 'A Dialogue Philosophicall . . . together with the Wittie Invention of an Artificiall Perpetual Motion . . .,' London, 1612, 4to. 11. 'A Silver Watch-ball,' 10th impression, 1614, 8vo; this proved a very popular work of devotion, and it reached a nineteenth edition in 1650. 12. 'The Chariot of Devotion . . .,' London, 1618, 8vo. Tymme also 'newly corrected and augmented' 'A Looking-Glasse for the Court' (1575), translated by Sir Francis Bryan [q.v.] in 1548.

[Works in Brit. Mus. Libr.; authorities cited; Wood's Athenae, ed. Bliss, i. 170, u. 12; Halkett and Laing's Anonymous Lit. cols. 604, 2589]

A. F. P.

TYMMS, SAMUEL (1808-1871), antiquary, was born at Camberwell in Surrey on 27 Nov. 1808. Early in life he obtained employment on the staff of the 'Gentleman's Magazine.' He seems to have moved into Suffolk while still young, and almost the whole of his antiquarian work is intimately connected with that county, especially with the town of Bury St. Edmunds, where he was engaged on the staff of the 'Bury Post.' In 1857 he moved to Lowestoft, setting up a business as bookseller and stationer. There, in 1858, he began to edit and publish the 'East Anglian,' a local antiquarian magazine, which he continued to conduct until his death.

About 1840 he became a member of the Genealogical and Historical Society, and in 1853 a fellow of, and afterwards local secretary to, the Society of Antiquaries, in the 'Proceedings' of which institution his name not infrequently occurs. He also displayed considerable activity in the work of the West Suffolk Archaeological Institute. Tymms died at Lowestoft on 29 April 1871. He married, on 10 July 1844, Mary Anne, daughter of John Jugg of Ely, and had five children.

He wrote: 1. 'The British Family Topographer' (7 vols. 1832-43), giving an encyclopedic account of the antiquities of the different counties of England, classed according to the old English circuits. 2. 'Architectural and Historical Account of the Church of St. Mary, Bury St. Edmunds,' This work appeared in instalments, beginning in 1848, and was reissued as a whole in 1854. 3. 'Bury Wills and Inventories,' perhaps his best known work, which he edited for the Camden Society in 1850. He also wrote many small antiquarian monographs, guide-books to Ely Cathedral and to Bury St. Edmunds, the latter of which has gone through several editions, and still maintains its position as a cheap handbook. A small treatise on 'Peg Taulards' (1827) may be noticed as a very early work. Mention should also be made of his contributions to the 'Proceedings' of the Suffolk Institute of Archaeology, which he printed; as well as to the 'East Anglian,' which he both printed and edited.

There is in the British Museum Library an interesting folio volume consisting of newspaper cuttings—mostly of a biographical nature—extracted and arranged by Tymms, with manuscript notes added.

[East Anglian, 3rd ser. vii. 65 (May 1897)—biographical notice with portrait; Lowestoft Observer, 6 May 1871; Brit. Mus. Cat.; private information.] E. C. E.

TYNDALE, WILLIAM (d. 1536), translator of the Bible, was born 'on the borders of Wales,' probably between 1490 and 1495. Tyndale's parentage is uncertain, but John Stokesley, bishop of London [q. v.], in a letter to Cromwell dated 26 Jan. 1532-3, states that he was the brother of Edward Tyndale, who, on 18 July 1519, was appointed general receiver of the lands in Gloucestershire, Somerset, and Warwickshire of Maurice, lord Berkeley (Letters and Papers of Henry VIII. iii. No. 405, vi. No. 82). Edward Tyndale had estates at Pull Court as well as the manor of Hurst in Slimbridge, and was closely connected with the Tyndale family of Stinchcombe in Gloucestershire. William Tyndale was known by the alias of William Huchyns. All the groups of the Tyndale family in Gloucestershire were accustomed to use both surnames, and had a tradition that they first adopted that of Huchyns to escape observation on emigrating from the north in the time of the wars of York and Lancaster. William and Edward Tyndale were probably younger brothers of Richard Tyndale of Melksham Court. Foxe also mentions another of William's brothers, John Tyndale, a merchant. A different William Tyndale of North Nibley, formerly identified with the translator, was alive in 1542.

Tyndale commenced to study at Oxford at the beginning of Easter term 1510 under the name of William Huchyns. According to Foxe, he was entered at Magdalen Hall. He supplicated for admission as B.A. on 13 May 1512, and was admitted on 4 July. In February 1512-13 he acted as a detainer; he was licensed for the degree of M.A. on 26 June 1515, and was created M.A. on 2 July (Register of the University of Oxford, Oxford Hist. Soc., i. 80, 121). Foxe relates that, besides improving himself 'in knowledge of tongues and other liberal arts,' he devoted especial attention to theology, and 'read privily to certain students and fellows of Magdalen College some parcel of divinity, instructing them in the knowledge and truth of the scriptures.' From Oxford Tyndale, shortly after obtaining his master's degree, removed to Cambridge, remaining there probably till the close of 1521. Both universities at the time of Tyndale's sojourn were strongly influenced by the spirit of the new learning. At Oxford John Colet [q. v.], in his lectures on the New Testament between 1497 and 1505, broke boldly with scholastic traditions and revolutionised the method of scriptural study. Cambridge enjoyed the benefit of the teachings of Erasmus, who was admitted Lady Margaret professor of divinity in 1511, and remained in England till the autumn of 1513. It is likely that the high reputation for theology and Greek that Cambridge had acquired under him attracted Tyndale thither.

Before the commencement of 1522 Tyndale, who by this time had probably taken priest's orders, accepted the post of tutor to the children of Sir John Walsh, lord of the manor of Old Sodbury in Gloucestershire. Walsh's wife, Anne, was the daughter of Sir Robert Poyntz of Iron-Acton in Gloucestershire, and sister of Sir Francis Poyntz [q. v.] As the eldest of Sir John Walsh's sons was barely five years old, Tyndale had ample leisure, and employed it preaching in the surrounding villages and at Bristol to the crowds that assembled on College Green. He found the Gloucestershire clergy less advanced in their opinions than the scholars of the universities, and was constantly involved in strenuous theological discussions. In support of his views he translated the 'Enchiridion Militis Christiani' of Erasmus, perhaps from the edition of 1518, which was prefaced by a vigorous diatribe against the vices of ecclesiastics. The manuscript was probably never printed. An English translation, published by Wynkyn de Worde in 1533, has been without probability identified with Tyndale's lost work. Startled by his opinions, and annoyed by the countenance he received from Sir John Walsh, the clergy, in the absence of the bishop, Julio de' Medici (afterwards Clement VII.), accused him to William of Malvern [q. v.], the chancellor of the see. Malvern summoned him before him and rated him soundly for his proceedings, but, being satisfied as to his orthodoxy, allowed him to depart 'neither branded as a heretic, nor trammelled by any oath of abjuration.' The persecution which he encountered from the clergy strengthened Tyndale in the belief that the church was in a state of serious decline, and he resolved to provide an antidote by translating the New Testament into the vernacular. He openly expressed his determination to one of his opponents in the emphatic words, 'If God spare my life, ere many years I will cause a boy that driveth the plough shall know more of the scripture than thou dost.'

Tyndale's increasing sympathy with the reformers rendered Gloucestershire no longer a secure haven, and he resolved to remove to London, where he hoped for assistance from the distinguished scholar Cuthbert Tunstall [q. v.], who had been installed bishop on 22 Oct. 1522. He arrived in London about July or August 1523, with a letter of introduction from Walsh to Sir Henry Guildford

[q. v.], master of the horse, and he solicited in person the patronage of Tunstall. Tunstall was a courtly scholar with little sympathy for reform, and declined to give Tyndale any help. Disappointed in this hope, he obtained employment as preacher at St. Dunstan's-in-the-West, where his discourses found favour with one of his auditors, Humphrey Monmouth (ibid. 1537), a cloth merchant and citizen of London, who was afterwards knighted and served as sheriff in 1535. Monmouth took him to his house for half a year and paid him 10*l.* sterling to pray for his 'father and mother their souls, and all Christian souls' ('Petition of Humphrey Monmouth to Wolsey' in Letters and Papers of Henry VIII., iv. No. 4282). During his residence in London Tyndale first came under the influence of Luther's opinions, and also formed a firm friendship with John Frith [q. v.], who was burned as a protestant in 1533. He, however, found it impossible to accomplish his translation of the New Testament in England, and in May 1524 set sail for Hamburg, leaving most of his books with Monmouth. From Hamburg he went to Wittenberg to visit Luther, and probably remained there till April 1525, when he returned to Hamburg to receive a remittance from England. During this period he was busily engaged in his task of translation, employing William Roy (ibid. 1527) [q. v.] as his amanuensis. From Hamburg Tyndale and Roy proceeded to Cologne, where they made arrangements with Quental and Byrekmann for printing the translation. The work had proceeded as far as the sheet bearing the signature K when it was discovered, soon after the beginning of September, by the catholic controversialist John Cochleus, dean of the church of the Blessed Virgin at Frankfurt, for whom the same firm were bringing out an edition of the works of Rupert, a former abbot of Deutz. Cochleus obtained an injunction from the senate of Cologne interdicting the printers from proceeding with the work, and wrote to Henry VIII and Wolsey, warning them to keep a strict watch for the work at the English seaports. Tyndale and Roy made their escape with the printed sheets to Worms, where they probably arrived in October, and made arrangements with the printer Schoeffer for issuing the translation in a different form. Copies were smuggled over into England, and in 1526 they attracted the attention of the clergy (ELLIS, Original Letters, ii. 74, 77). In spite of a plea for toleration from Wolsey, a conclave of bishops resolved that the book should be burned, and Tunstall, after denouncing it from St. Paul's Cross on 24 Oct., issued an injunction directing all who possessed copies to give them up under pain of excommunication. A similar mandate was issued on 3 Nov. by William Warham [q. v.], archbishop of Canterbury, who himself also bought up copies of Tyndale's translation on the continent in order to destroy them (Letters and Papers of Henry VIII., iv. No. 2807; ELLIS, Original Letters, 3rd ser. ii. 86). About the close of 1526 it became known that Tyndale was concerned in the translation. Early in 1528, on the arrest of Thomas Garrett at Oxford, the agency for distributing the testaments was discovered; and Wolsey, uneasy at the large sale of the book and stung by Roy's satire, 'Rede me and be nott wrothe,' which he attributed to Tyndale, took measures for seizing the translator at Worms. Tyndale, however, had warning, and took refuge at Marburg, where he enjoyed the protection of Philip the Magnanimous, landgrave of Hesse, and the friendship of Hermann Buschius, professor of poetry and eloquence at the university. At Marburg he probably met Patrick Hamilton [q. v.], the Scottish proto-martyr, and later he was joined there by John Frith. Hitherto Tyndale had preserved his belief in transubstantiation, but between 1528 and 1530, through the persuasions of Robert Barnes [q. v.], he adopted the views of Zuinglius, the most advanced of the reformers. Rejecting not merely Luther's doctrine of consubstantiation but even Calvin's theory of a spiritual presence in the sacrament, he regarded the celebration of the Lord's supper simply as a commemorative service.

On 8 May 1528 appeared Tyndale's 'Parable of the Wicked Mammon,' printed at Marburg by Hans Luft in octavo, of which a copy is preserved in the British Museum. The quarto copy in the same library, bearing the same date, was in reality printed in London about 1550. Another edition was printed 'for James Nycolson, Southwark,' in 1536. It was more than once reprinted in London in the reigns of Edward VI and Elizabeth. An edition was issued in 1842 (London, 8vo). The work is an exposition of the parable of the unjust steward, treats chiefly of the doctrine of justification by faith, and contains also passages on property strongly controverting the idea of a right of absolute ownership apart from social obligations. These opinions did not prevent Sir Thomas More from styling it 'a very treasury and well-spring of wickedness.' On 2 Oct. 1528 was issued Tyndale's most important original work, 'The Obedience of a Christian man, and how Christe rulers ought to governe, printed in octavo by Hans Luft of Marburg. A second edition appeared in 1535 in octavo, dated Marburg, but more probably printed in London. Other undated black-letter editions were issued in London between 1540 and 1560, besides one printed by William Copland in 1561 (London, 8vo). This book was edited by Richard Lovett in 1888 for the 'Christian Classics Series.' The work is a defence of the reformers against charges of encouraging disobedience to the civil power. It lays down the duty of absolute submission to the temporal sovereign, and retorts the charge of insubordination against the ecclesiastical authorities. It also insists on the paramount authority of scripture in matters of doctrine. 'The Obedience' for the first time stated clearly the two great principles of the English reformation—the supreme authority of scripture in the church, and the supreme authority of the king in the state. The book was introduced to the notice of Henry VIII through Anne Boleyn, and met with his approval (STRYEN, Ecclesiastical Memorials, 1822, i. 178; CALVENDISH, Wolsey, ed. Singer, ii. 202-5).

Early in 1529 Tyndale, who seems to have made his way from Marburg to the Low Countries, was shipwrecked on the coast of Holland on his way to Hamburg. He lost his books and papers as well as the manuscript of his translation of Deuteronomy, which he had just completed. He, however, proceeded to Hamburg, where he remained for some time in the house of Margaret van Emmerson, a senator's widow, labouring on the translation of the Pentateuch. Later in the year he proceeded to Antwerp, where he found that Tunstall, who, with More, had been negotiating the treaty of Cambrai, was making large purchases of his testaments in order to burn them, in spite of his companion's economic objections. Through a London merchant, Augustine Packington, Tunstall unwittingly purchased a number of copies from Tyndale himself, whom he thus provided with funds. Part of the money Tyndale probably laid out in purchasing eleven blocks, with which he afterwards illustrated the book of Exodus; they had previously done duty for Vorstermann's Dutch Bible printed at Antwerp in 1528.

In 1530 appeared 'The Practyse of prelates,' a work in which Tyndale framed his final and most unsparring indictment of the Roman hierarchy. He concluded by attacking categorically the whole of Wolsey's administration, and by denouncing Henry's divorce proceedings. On this point he entirely separated himself from the other English reformers. His long exile had distorted his view of English affairs, and he regarded Wolsey's disgrace as a subterfuge of the cardinal to escape the consequences of his maladministration. His views did him much injury with Henry, and quite destroyed the effects of the 'Obedience' on the king's mind. When Tyndale's 'Practyse' was reissued in 1548 (London, 8vo), his remarks on the divorce were carefully excised. A copy of the first edition, printed at Marburg by Hans Luft (in 8vo), is in the British Museum.

In the meantime Tyndale became engaged in literary warfare with Sir Thomas More. On 7 March 1527-8 Tunstall invited More to undertake the defence of the church against 'the children of iniquity,' accompanying his request with a formal license to read heretical works which assailed the catholic faith. In June 1529 appeared 'A dyaloge of Sir Thomas Mores . . . Wherin be treatyd dyvers maters as of the . . . worschyp of ymagys & reliques, prayng to sayntys, & goyng o pylgrymage. Wyth many othere thyngys touchyng the pestylent secte of Luther and Tyndale.' In this great work More, declining to enter into the practical question of this ignorance and the immorality of the clergy, defended with much acuteness and logical power the doctrines of the Roman church against the attacks of the reformers. In the spring or early summer of 1531 Tyndale committed to the press 'An answer unto Sir Thomas Mores dialoge' (in 8vo, printed at Antwerp according to Joye; edited for the Parker Society by H. Walter in 1850). The 'Answer,' though inferior in literary form to More's 'Dyaloge,' was a clear and cogent treatise written with great satiric force, but marred by intense personal bitterness. Tyndale's acrimony was due in great part to his belief that More had sold his pen to further his political advancement. He could not reconcile More's defence of the church with his former attacks on its practical abuses, and failed to realise his horror of the reformers' doctrinal opinions. More several times returned to the controversy, devoting to it most of his scanty leisure. In 1532 appeared 'The Confutacyon of Tyndale's Answer,' followed in 1533 by 'The second parte of the Confutacyon of Tyndale's Answer.' 'The Confutacyon' was distinguished by virulence and scurrility. It is of inordinate length, and in literary merit is far beneath both his own 'Dyaloge' and Tyndale's 'Answer.' In the 'Apologye of Syr Thomas More' (1533) and in the 'Debellacyon of Saleme and Bizance' (1533), written in reply to Christopher St. German [q. v.] (whose mother belonged to the Tyndale family), More again reverted to the subject. This contest of Tyndale and More was the classic controversy of the English reformation. No other discussion was carried on between men of such pre-eminent ability and with such clear apprehension of the points at issue. To More's assertion of the paramount authority of the church Tyndale replied by appealing to scripture, with an ultimate resort to individual judgment. From such divergent premises no agreement was possible.

In the meantime the face of affairs had considerably changed in England, where the contest on the divorce question had driven Henry into opposition to the pope. Cromwell was made a privy councillor in 1531, and in the same year Stephen Vaughan [q. v.], English envoy in the Netherlands, was instructed to communicate with Tyndale, whose views in his 'Obedience' were in accordance with Cromwell's policy. On 17 April 1531 Vaughan had a personal interview with Tyndale, near Antwerp, in which he suggested his return to England under a safe-conduct, but Tyndale expressed himself unwilling for fear of ecclesiastical resentment (Letters and Papers of Henry VIII, v. No. 201). Henry, however, considered Vaughan had made too many advances, and sent him a peremptory letter rebuking him for overmuch complaisance, and ordering him to make no further attempt to bring Tyndale to England (ib. v. No. 248). Two further interviews between Vaughan and Tyndale in May and June produced no result (ib. v. No. 246). The failure of the negotiations was a disappointment to Tyndale, and caused him to take a gloomy view of Henry's policy. In the prologue to his translation of Jonah, issued in the same year, he likened England to Nineveh, and called on her people to repent.

Towards the close of the year Henry VIII, assuming a more hostile attitude, demanded Tyndale's surrender from the emperor on the charge of spreading sedition in England. Meeting with a refusal, and deeming Vaughan too sympathetic, he instructed Sir Thomas Elyot [q. v.] to kidnap him if possible (ib. v. pp. 121, 142, 105, 244-5, 265-7, 409, 663). Tyndale in consequence left Antwerp, but returned in 1533, when the danger seemed past, and remained in the town for the rest of his life, occupied chiefly with the revision of his translations of the Pentateuch and the New Testament. In the middle of 1534 he took up his abode in the dwelling of Thomas Poyntz (probably a relative of Lady Walsh), an English merchant-adventurer. The house had been set apart since 1474 by the municipality for the use of English merchants, was known as the 'English House,' and was situated in a block of buildings between the present Rue de la Vieille Bourse and Rue Zirk. Towards the close of the year John Rogers (1500?-1555) [q. v.], the first martyr in the Marian persecution, came to Antwerp as English chaplain. He was a Roman catholic on his arrival, but afterwards joined the reformers, probably through the influence of Tyndale, with whom he became intimate.

In 1535 Tyndale made the acquaintance of a young Englishman, Henry Phillips, said to be a Roman catholic student at Louvain, who had fled to Flanders after robbing his father. This man, by falsely professing great zeal for religious reform, insinuated himself into Tyndale's confidence and, after receiving much kindness from him, decoyed him from the English House, and betrayed him to the imperial officers. He was arrested on 23 or 24 May 1535, and conveyed a prisoner to the castle of Vilvorde, the state prison of the Low Countries.

Phillips, who was an extreme catholic, was certainly not a royal agent, and strenuous efforts were afterwards made by Henry to get him into his power. Whether Tyndale was the victim of an English ecclesiastical plot is doubtful. Phillips was at various times in communication with leading English catholics, and he was assisted in his betrayal of Tyndale by an English priest named Gabriel Donne [q. v.], who soon afterwards was appointed abbot of Buckfastleigh in Devon. No direct evidence, however, that he was employed by the English catholics has ever been discovered, and it was very possibly on his own initiative that he sacrificed Tyndale, from whom he had borrowed money. Great efforts were made to procure Tyndale's liberation, and Poyntz was himself imprisoned for his zeal. The English merchants, after remonstrating with the queen regent, Mary of Hungary, and representing the arrest as a breach of their privileges, attempted to obtain the intervention of Henry VIII and Cromwell. So late as 13 April 1536, Vaughan wrote from Antwerp to Cromwell: 'If now you sent but your letter to the privy council [of Flanders], I could deliver Tyndals from the fire' (ib. x. No. 683). Even if willing, Henry was not in a position to do much. International usages gave him no ground for intervention, and he could hardly expect a personal favour from the Emperor Charles, with whom he was almost at open rupture. In September 1535 Cromwell wrote without effect to Carandulet, the archbishop of Palermo, president of the council, and to the Marquis of Bergen-op-Zoom, governor of Vilvorde, asking them to use their influence in favour of Tyndale. In 1536 Tyndale was brought to trial for heresy, condemned, degraded from his orders, and sentenced to death. No record of his trial has been found, and of his imprisonment only one memorial is known, an autograph letter from him to the governor of Vilvorde, discovered in the archives of the council of Brabant, requesting to be allowed his Hebrew bible, grammar, and dictionary. Tyndale was executed at Vilvorde on 6 Oct. 1536, being strangled at the stake and his body afterwards burnt. 'At the stake,' says Foxe, 'he cried with a fervent zeal and a loud voice, "Lord, open the king of England's eyes."' Eight years before he wrote: 'If they shall burn me, they shall do none other thing than I looked for.' 'There is none other way into the kingdom of life than through persecution and suffering of pain, and of very death after the ensample of Christ.'

Though not perhaps the foremost figure of the English reformation, Tyndale was one of the most remarkable of its leaders. He left his country an unknown exile; he lived abroad in poverty, obscurity, and danger; and yet before his death he had made his name a household word in England. His original writings bear the impress of sound scholarship and of the highest literary power. They are unquestionably the ablest expositions of the views of the more advanced English reformers who triumphed under Edward VI, and developed into the Puritan party under Elizabeth. His translation of the Bible, however, though incomplete, forms his surest title to fame. Its substantial accuracy and fidelity were fully endorsed by the translators of the authorised version, who not only retained the substance of his rendering where it was available, but adopted his style and method as their model throughout their work.

Tyndale's influence on the future development of English literature was very great. The simplicity and force of his style, his happy preservation of Hebrew idioms and modes of expression, and his utter lack of pedantry were all perpetuated in succeeding versions, and more especially in the authorised version of the Bible. Tyndale's scholarship was amply sufficient for the task of translation. At the time of his residence Cambridge was perhaps the best Greek school in England. Tyndale's familiarity with Hebrew has been questioned, but he had probably a fair acquaintance with the language when he left England, and abroad he had ample opportunity of extending his knowledge, especially at Worme, where there was a large Jewish colony. His learning was admitted even by his adversaries, including so competent a judge as Sir Thomas More; and, among his friends, Hermann Buschius, the great humanist, bore emphatic testimony to his perfect mastery of Greek, Latin, and Hebrew, as well as to his skill in German, Spanish, and French (SCHELLHOORN, Amoenitates Literariæ, 1731, iv. 431). His translations were made direct from the original without any undue dependence on other modern versions. He borrowed from Luther's German version only the arrangement, and a collation of texts demonstrates at once the independence of his rendering (for a contrary view in regard to the Pentateuch see Athenæum, 1885, i. 500, 562).

Tyndale did not live to accomplish the translation of the entire Bible. During his lifetime he published the New Testament, the Pentateuch, and the book of Jonah. There is strong ground for believing that he also left behind him a manuscript translation of Joshua, Judges, Ruth, Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles, completed while in prison.

Tyndale's translation of the New Testament was made from Erasmus's edition of the Greek text, with the assistance of Erasmus's Latin version, the Vulgate, and Luther's German translation. Of the first complete edition printed in 1525, two copies survive. The more perfect, wanting only the title-page, was discovered by the Earl of Oxford about 1740, and is now in the Baptist College at Bristol. The other, which is incomplete, is in the library of St. Paul's Cathedral. This edition was printed at Worms by Schoeffer in octavo, and illustrated by twelve woodcuts. It contains neither prologue nor glosses. The edition was reprinted from the Bristol copy by Bagster in 1836 (London, 8vo), and reproduced in facsimile by Francis Fry in 1862.

The sheets of Tyndale's translation of the New Testament, previously printed at Cologne, were also published. They did not contain more than St. Matthew's Gospel, with possibly a fragment of St. Mark, but they are mentioned in Tunstall's injunction, together with the Worms octavo edition, as if they formed an independent edition of the complete testament. The only fragment surviving is in the Grenville Library at the British Museum. It extends to the twelfth verse of the twenty-second chapter of Matthew. It is printed in quarto on the model of Luther's German Bible, with a prologue and marginal glosses, which in most cases are translations of those of Luther. It was photo-lithographed in 1871 for Arbar's 'Facsimile Texts.' The prologue, with some alterations, was separately reprinted in London by Thomas Godfrey before 1532 under the title 'A Pathway into the Holy Scripture' (reprinted for Parker Soc. 1848).

The demand for copies of Tyndale's translation, for reading or burning, induced the printers at Antwerp to issue surreptitious reprints of the Worms edition, and, according to Gsorge Joye [q. v.] in his 'Apology,' three had been issued by 1534. As the Flemings had no English assistance, the text became corrupt, and in 1534 Joye undertook to correct a fourth edition for Christopher of Endhoven's widow; it was published at Antwerp in August 1534 in 16mo. A unique copy is in the Grenville Library. Much to Tyndale's annoyance, Joye altered the text to favour his view of the condition of the dead before the judgment. In November 1534 Tyndale published his own revised version, which contained numerous changes, bringing the text into closer approximation to the Greek and expressing the meaning of the original more forcibly. It was printed in small octavo by Martin Emperowr at Antwerp, contains prologues to all the books except the Acts and the Apocalypse, is furnished with new marginal glosses, and is preceded by a preface in which he comments severely on the action of Joye. Joye defended himself in his 'Apology,' published in the same year. The prologues to Hebrews and St. James defended these epistles against Luther's assertion that they were not of apostolic authority. 'The Epistles taken out of the Old Testament . . . after the usage of Salisbury' are appended. The British Museum contains three copies, one of which has on the edges the inscription 'Anna Angliæ Regina,' and is believed to have been presented by Tyndale to Anne Boleyn. The edition was reprinted in Bagster's 'Hexapla' in 1841. A third edition (in small 8vo), further revised by Tyndale, was printed at Antwerp by Godfried Van der Haghen in 1535-4 (Bibliographer, 1881-2, i. 3-11, article by Henry Bradshaw, reprinted separately in 1886). The peculiar orthography of a fourth edition, published in 1535 without place or printer's name, has given rise to the extravagant surmise that Tyndale was a philological reformer, or that he designedly wrote it in the dialect of the Gloucestershire ploughboys. Its eccentricities are probably due to the Flemish printers; the most perfect copy is in the Cambridge University Library. Numerous later editions appeared, chiefly at Antwerp and at London, between 1536 and 1550. Twenty-one of them are described in Fry's 'Bibliographical Description of the New Testament.' The first printed in England was probably the folio of 1536, without place or printer's name; a perfect copy is in the Bodleian Library, Oxford. It has been conjectured from contemporary references that Tyndale issued a separate translation of St. Matthew and St. Mark before 1525, during his residence at Wittenberg, but the balance of probability is against the supposition. In criticising Tyndale's translation in his 'Dyaloge,' More with considerable reason objected that Tyndale, to favour his own doctrinal views, had substituted other words for customary ecclesiastical terms, such as 'priest' and 'church.' In reply Tyndale urged that he aimed at a literal rendering of the Greek, and that such terms had been perverted from their primitive meaning. Such a plea involved of course the whole question at issue between the catholics and reformers, and proved that the point was one which could hardly be settled by any philological discussion. The translators of the authorised version in many cases failed to endorse Tyndale's action, but in one important instance, the substitution of 'love' for 'charity,' the translators of the revised version reverted to his rendering. In 1846 William Maskell published 'A Collation of Tyndale's Version with the Authorised Version.'

Tyndale's translation of the Pentateuch was issued in octavo at Marburg from the printing-house of Hans Luft. The work is preceded by a general preface, and a separate preface is prefixed to each book; lists are appended to Genesis, Exodus, and Deuteronomy, explaining unusual words; and marginal glosses are added, strongly controversial in tone. Genesis and Numbers are in black letter, while Exodus, Leviticus, and Deuteronomy are in Roman letter, a peculiarity which has occasioned the surmise that the last three books were not printed at Marburg. An examination of the work, however, furnishes incontrovertible proofs that they all proceeded from the same press, though perhaps not all printed in the same year. Genesis bears the date 17 Jan. 1529-30, while the others are undated. A study of the text shows that the translation was made direct from the Hebrew, with the assistance of the Vulgate and Luther's German translation. The glosses, unlike those of his New Testament, though tinged with Luther's spirit, are in no case translations of those of the German reformer; they are more pungent and satirical than those accompanying the New Testament. The only perfect copy of the first edition is in the Grenville Library at the British Museum. A second edition, with a new preface, was issued in octavo in 1534. It contained the book of Genesis in Roman letter, with several verbal alterations, and the other books exactly as first printed. Another edition, in octavo, appeared in London in 1551. A reprint, with a biographical and bibliographical introduction by J. I. Mombert, was issued in 1884 (New York, 8vo).

Tyndale's translation of the book of Jonah was published with a prologue in 1531, probably from the press of Martin Emperowr at Antwerp. A unique copy, now in the British Museum, was discovered in 1801 by Arthur Charles Harvey, rector of Ickworth, and afterwards bishop of Bath and Wells. It was reproduced in facsimile in 1863 by Francis Fry with an introduction and with Coverdale's version appended.

After Tyndale's death the whole of his translations of the New Testament and Pentateuch, as well as his manuscript translations from Joshua to Chronicles, were included by John Rogers in 'Matthew's Bible,' which was licensed by Henry VIII for sale in England.

Besides the works already mentioned, Tyndale was the author of: 1. 'A Prologue upon the Epistle of Saint Paul unto the Romans,' printed separately at Worms or possibly at Strassburg in 1526. It is not extant in separate form; Parker Soc. 1848. 2. 'The exposition of the fyrste Epistle of seynt Jhon, with a Prologge' [Martin Emperowr, Antwerp], 1531, 8vo, Brit. Mus.; Parker Soc. 1849. 3. 'An Expositioun upon the v., vi., vii. chapters of Mathew' [Marburg], 1532, 8vo. (Brit. Mus.); another edition printed by 'Wylliam Hill' appeared about 1550 (London, 8vo); Parker Soc. 1849. 4. 'A fruitfull and godly treatise expressing the right institution and usage of the Sacramentes of Baptisme, and the Sacrament of the body and bloud of our Sauour Jesu Christ,' 1533?; republished with the title 'A Briefe declaration of the sacramente,' London [1550?], 16mo.; Parker Soc. 1848. 5. 'The Testament of Master William Tracie esquier expounded both by William Tyndall and Jho Frith,' 1535, 8vo [see under TRACY, RICHARD]. In his preface to the 'Breife Chronycle concerning the examination and death of Sir John Oldecastell,' published in 1544, Bale mentions that Tyndale fourteen years before printed a brief account of Cobham's examination, written by one of Cobham's friends. No copy of this work is extant, but it is mentioned in a list of heretical books (cf. Letters and Papers of Henry VIII, v. 269). Bale also states that Tyndale revised and corrected 'The Examinacon of Master William Thorpe' (d. 1407?) [q. v.], printed with the former work (Bale, Select Works, Parker Soc., pp. 6, 62, 64). To Tyndale are also doubtfully assigned a treatise on 'Matrimony,' published in 1529, of which no copy is extant; expositions of the second and third epistles of John bound with his exposition on the first, in a copy in the library of St. Paul's Cathedral; and the anonymous 'Souper of the Lorde . . . Imprinted at Nornburg by Niclas Twonson, 6 April 1533,' 8vo, which Sir Thomas More in his 'Answer to the fyrst parte,' 1534, attributed with some hesitation to Tyndale.

A collective edition of the writings of Tyndale, Frith, and Barnes, known as Day's folio, was issued in London by John Day (1522-1584) [q. v.] in two volumes in 1572-3, with a preface by Foxe, and the lives of the three martyrs extracted from his 'Actes and Monuments.' A new edition of the works of Tyndale and Frith by Thomas Russell (1781?-1846) [q. v.], in three volumes (London, 8vo), appeared between 1828 and 1831. It formed the first instalment of a series entitled 'The Worke of the English and Scottish Reformers.' No more of the series were published. Three volumes of Tyndale's original writings, including all his prefaces and prologues as well as 'The Parable of the Wicked Mammon,' 'The Obedience of a Christian Man,' 'The Practise of Prelates,' and the 'Answer to Sir Thomas More,' were edited for the Parker Society by Henry Walter, and published in 1848, 1849, and 1850.

There are portraits of Tyndale at Magdalen and Hertford Colleges, Oxford. A third belongs to the British and Foreign Bible Society.

A memorial cenotaph was erected to Tyndale at Nibley in Gloucestershire, then supposed to be his birthplace, and was inaugurated by the Earl of Ducie on 6 Nov. 1866. A statue of the reformer by (Sir) John Edgar Boehm, erected in London at the west end of the West Garden on the Victoria Embankment, was unveiled by the Earl of Shaftesbury on 7 May 1884.

Although 'Tyndale' is now the accepted mode of spelling the reformer's name, contemporary editions of his work and his sole autograph give his name as 'Tindale.'

[The amplest authority for Tyndale's life is Foxe's Actes and Monuments. Though unreliable, Foxe had access to good information. In his editions of 1563 and 1570 he gives two distinct accounts. The earlier is the shorter and more graphic, while the later is amplified and resembles more closely Foxe's usual style. It has been conjectured that the former account was communicated to Foxe by a personal friend of Tyndale. Many important facts may be obtained from Tyndale's own works; More's controversial writings; Latimer's Sermons; Brewer and Gairdner's Letters and Papers of Henry VIII.; Cochlæus's Commentaria de Actis et Scriptis M. Luther, 1549; Joye's Apology, ed. Arber, 1882; Strype's Ecclesiastical Memorials; Wilkins's Concilia, vol. iii.; Hall's Chronicle; Wood's Athenæ Oxon. ed. Bliss, i. 94. Of modern biographies, that by Robert Demaus (1871) is by far the best. A second edition by Richard Lovett appeared in 1886. For the bibliography of Tyndale's New Testament and Pentateuch, see Dore's Old Bibles, 1888, Fry's Editions of the New Testament, 1878, Mombert's Reprint of Tyndale's Five Books of Moses, 1884, and Westcott's English Bible. No adequate bibliography of Tyndale's original works exists. Other works which should be referred to are: Greenfield's Genealogy of the Tyndale Family, 1843; Greenfield's Notes on the Tyndale Family, 1878; Walter's Biographical Notice of Tyndale prefixed to Tyndale's Doctrinal Treatises (Parker Soc.), 1849; Offor's Account of Tyndale's Life and Writings prefixed to Bagshaw's reprint of Tyndale's New Testament, 1836; Introduction to Arber's reproduction of the Cologne fragment; Biographia Britannica; Anderson's Annals of the English Bible; Chester's Life of Rogers; Lewis's Hist. of the Translation of the Bible into English; Cotton's Lists of Editions of the Bible in English; Ames's Typogr. Antiquities, ed. Horbert; Catalogue of Offor's Library, 1866; Demaus's Life of Latimer; Froude's History of England; Offor's Collections for Tyndale's Life in Brit. Mus. Addit. MS. 26670; Dixon's Hist. of Church of England.] E. I. C.

TYNDALL, JOHN (1820-1893), natural philosopher, son of John Tyndall and his wife Sarah (Macassey), was born at Leighlin Bridge, co. Carlow, on 2 Aug. 1820. The Tyndalls, who claimed relationship with the family of William Tyndale [q.v.] the martyr, had crossed from Gloucestershire to Ireland in the seventeenth century. The elder John Tyndall, son of a small landowner, although poor, was a man of superior intellect, and he gave his son the best education which his circumstances could afford. At the local national school young Tyndall acquired a thorough knowledge of elementary mathematics, which qualified him to enter as civil assistant (in 1839) the ordnance survey of Ireland. In 1842 he was selected, as one of the best draughtsmen in his department, for employment on the English survey. While quartered at Preston in Lancashire he joined the mechanics' institute and attended its lectures. He was at this time much impressed by Carlyle's 'Past and Present,' and to the stimulating influence of Carlyle's works was in part due his later resolve to follow a scientific career. On quitting the survey Tyndall was employed for three years as a railway engineer.

In 1847 he accepted an offer from George Edmondson [q.v.], principal of Queenwood College, Hampshire, to join the college staff as teacher of mathematics and surveying. Mr. (now Sir Edward) Frankland was lecturer on chemistry, and the two young men agreed respectively to instruct each other in chemistry and mathematics. But Queenwood did not yield all the opportunities they wished for, and they presently resolved to take advantage of the excellent instruction to be enjoyed at the university of Marburg in Hesse-Cassel. The decision was for Tyndall a momentous one. He had nothing but his own work and slender savings to depend on, and his friends thought him mad for abandoning the brilliant possibilities then open to a railway engineer.

In October 1848 Tyndall and Frankland settled at Marburg. Tyndall attended Bunsen's lectures on experimental and practical chemistry, and studied mathematics and physics in the classes and laboratories of Stgmann, Gerling, and Knoblauch. By intense application he accomplished in less than two years the work usually extended over three, and thus became doctor of philosophy early in 1850. Thenceforward he was free to devote himself entirely to original research.

His first scientific paper was a mathematical essay on screw surfaces—'Die Schraubenfläche mit geneigter Erzeugungslinie und die Bedingungen des Gleichgewichts für solche Schrauben'—which formed his inaugural dissertation when he took his degree. His first physical paper, published in the 'Philosophical Magazine' for February 1851, was on the 'Phenomena of a Water Jet'—a subject comparatively simple but not without scientific interest.

In conjunction with Knoblauch, Tyndall executed and published an important investigation 'On the Magneto-optic Properties of Crystals and the relation of Magnetism and Diamagnetism to Molecular Arrangement' (Phil. Mag. July 1850). They claimed to have discovered the existence of a relation between the density of matter and the manifestation of the magnetic force. Their fundamental idea was that the component molecules of crystals, and other substances, are not in every direction at the same distance from each other. The superior magnetic energy of a crystal in a given direction, when suspended between the poles, they attributed to the greater closeness of its molecules in that direction. In support of their assumption they showed that, by pressure, the magnetic axis of a bismuth crystal could be shifted  $90^\circ$  in azimuth, the line of pressure always setting itself parallel with, or at right angles to, the line joining the two magnetic poles, according as the crystal was magnetic or diamagnetic. This explanation differed essentially from that of Faraday and Plücker. In June 1850 Tyndall went to England, and at the meeting of the British Association of that year in Edinburgh he read an account of his investigation which excited considerable interest. He afterwards returned to Marburg for six months, and carried out a lengthy inquiry into electro-magnetic attractions at short distances (Phil. Mag. April 1851).

At Easter 1851 Tyndall finally left Marburg and went to Berlin, where he became acquainted with many eminent men of science. In the laboratory of Professor Magnus he conducted a second investigation on 'Diamagnetism and Magneto-crystalline Action' (ib. September 1851), which formed a sequel to that previously undertaken with Knoblauch. A paper describing his results was read at the Ipswich meeting of the British Association. He showed that the antithesis of the two forces was absolute: diamagnetism resembling magnetism as to polarity and all other characteristics, differing from it only by the substitution of repulsion for attraction and vice versa.

The question of diamagnetic polarity was much discussed. Its existence, originally asserted by Faraday and reaffirmed by Weber in 1848, had been subsequently denied by Faraday, who still continued doubtful. To meet all objections, Tyndall, at a later date, again took up the subject, and in three conclusive investigations, the second of which formed the subject of the Bakerian lecture delivered before the Royal Society in 1855, he put the polarity of bismuth and other diamagnetic bodies beyond question (ib. November 1851; Phil. Trans. 1855; ib. 1856, pt. i.). Five years were devoted by him to the investigation of diamagnetism and the influence of crystalline structure and mechanical pressure upon the manifestations of magnetic force. The original papers (with a few omissions in the last edition) are collected in his book on 'Diamagnetism' (see below).

Before leaving Marburg in 1851, Tyndall had agreed to return to Queenwood; this time as lecturer on mathematics and natural philosophy. Here he remained two years. The first of the three investigations just alluded to was carried out at Queenwood, as was also a series of experiments on the 'Conduction of Heat through Wood' (see 'Molecular Influences,' Phil. Trans. January 1853). On 3 June 1852 Tyndall was elected fellow of the Royal Society.

While at Queenwood he applied for several positions which offered a wider scope for his abilities. On his way to Ipswich in 1851 he had made the acquaintance of T. H. Huxley, and a warm and enduring friendship resulted. They made joint applications for the chairs respectively of natural history and physics then vacant at Toronto, but, in spite of high testimonials, they were unsuccessful. They also failed in candidatures for chairs in the newly founded university of Sydney, New South Wales. Meanwhile, soon after Tyndall's departure from Berlin, Dr. Henry Bence Jones [q. v.] visited that city, and, hearing much of Tyndall's labours and personality, caused him to be invited to give a Friday evening lecture at the Royal Institution. The lecture, 'On the Influence of Material Aggregation upon the Manifestations of Force' (Roy. Inst. Proc. i, 185), was delivered on 11 Feb. 1853. It produced an extraordinary impression, and Tyndall, hitherto known only among physicists, became famous beyond the limits of scientific society. In May 1853 he was unanimously chosen as professor of natural philosophy in the Royal Institution. The appointment had the special charm of making him the colleague of Faraday. Seldom have two men worked together so harmoniously as did Faraday and Tyndall during the years that followed. Their relationship from first to last resembled that of father and son. Tyndall's 'Faraday as a Discoverer' bears striking testimony to their attachment. Other sketches of Faraday by Tyndall are in his 'Fragments of Science,' and in the life of Faraday in this dictionary.

Tyndall's career was now definitely marked out. To the end of his active life his best energies were devoted to the service of the Royal Institution. In 1807, when Faraday died, Tyndall succeeded him in his position as superintendent of the Institution. On his own retirement in the autumn of 1887 he was elected honorary professor.

In 1854, after attending the British Association meeting at Liverpool, Tyndall visited the slate quarries of Penrhyn. His familiarity with the effects of pressure upon the structure of crystals led him to give especial attention to the problem of slaty cleavage. By careful observation and experiments with white wax and many other substances which develop cleavage in planes perpendicular to pressure, he satisfied himself that pressure alone was sufficient to produce the cleavage of slate rocks. On 6 June 1856 he lectured on the subject at the Royal Institution (see appendix to Glaciers of the Alps). Huxley, who was present, suggested afterwards that the same cause might possibly explain the laminated structure of glacier ice recently described in Forbes's 'Travels in the Alps.' The friends agreed to take a holiday and inspect the glaciers together. The results of the observations made during this and two subsequent visits to Switzerland are given in Tyndall's classical work 'The Glaciers of the Alps' (see below). The original memoirs are in the 'Philosophical Transactions' for 1857 and 1859. Tyndall, assisted by his friend Thomas Archer Hirst, made many measurements upon the glaciers in continuation of the work of Agassiz and Forbes. He discussed, in particular, the question as to the conditions which enable a rigid body like ice to move like a river. He showed very clearly the defects of former theories, proving by repeated observations on the structure and properties of ice the inefficacy of the generally admitted plastic theory to account for the phenomena. Through the direct application of the doctrine of regelation he arrived at a satisfactory explanation of the nature of glacier motion. The veined structure he ascribed to mechanical pressure, and the formation of crevasses to strains and pressures occurring in the body of the glacier. In assigning to Rendu his position in the history of glacier theories, Tyndall gave offence to James David Forbes [q. v.] A controversy followed, in which the fairness of Tyndall's attitude was fully vindicated.

The expedition to Switzerland, undertaken for a scientific purpose, had a secondary outcome. Tyndall was fascinated by the mountains, and from that time forward yearly sought refreshment in the Alps when his labours in London were over. He became an accomplished mountaineer. In company with Mr. Vaughan Hawkins he made one of the earliest assaults upon the Matterhorn in 1860. He crossed over its summit from Brouil to Zermatt in 1868. The first ascent of the Weisshorn was made by him, in 1861. Tyndall's descriptions of his alpine adventures are not only graphic and characterised by his keen interest in scientific problems, but show a poetical appreciation of mountain beauties in which he is approached by few alpine travellers.

The very important series of researches on 'Radiant Heat in its relation to gases and vapours,' which occupied him on and off for twelve years, and with which his name will be always especially associated, were begun in 1859. He was led from the consideration of glacier problems to study the part played by aqueous vapour and other constituents of the atmosphere in producing the remarkable conditions of temperatures which prevail in mountainous regions. The inquiry was one of exceptional difficulty. Prior to 1859 no means had been found of determining by experiment, as Melloni had done for solids and liquids, the absorption, radiation, and transmission of heat by gases and vapours. By the invention of new and more delicate methods Tyndall succeeded in controlling the refractory gases. He found unsuspected differences to exist in their respective powers of absorption. While elementary gases offered practically no obstacle to the passage of heat rays, some of the compound gases absorbed more than eighty per cent. of the incident radiation. Allotropic forms came under the same rule; ozone, for example, being a much better absorbent than oxygen. The temperature of the source of heat was found to be of importance; heat of a higher temperature was much more penetrative than heat of a lower temperature.

The power to absorb and the power to radiate Tyndall showed to be perfectly reciprocal. He also established that, as regards their powers of absorption and radiation, liquids and their vapours respectively follow the same order. Thus he was able to determine the position of aqueous vapour, which, on account of condensation, could not be experimented upon directly. Experiments made with dry and humid air corroborated the inference that as water transcends all other liquids, so aqueous vapour is powerful above all other vapours, as a radiator and absorber. These results, questioned by Magnus and by a few later experimenters, but fully established by Tyndall, explained a number of phenomena previously unaccounted for. Since Wells's researches on dew, no fact has been established of greater importance to the science of meteorology than the high absorptive and radiative power of aqueous vapour. Many years later an experiment made in his presence by Mr. Graham Bell suggested to Tyndall a novel and interesting method of indirectly confirming his former results. (See 'Action of Free Molecules on Radiant Heat, and its Conversion thereby into Sound,' Phil. Trans. 1882, pt. i.)

Using a dark solution of iodine in bisulphide of carbon as a ray-filter, Tyndall was able approximately to determine the proportion of luminous to non-luminous rays in the electric and other lights. He also found that the obscure rays collected by means of a rock-salt lens would ignite combustible materials at the invisible focus; while some non-combustible bodies, exposed at the same dark focus, became luminous or calorescent. The astounding change in the deportment of matter towards heat radiated from an obscure source which accompanies the act of chemical combination, and many other points of equal importance, were first established by these researches, for which Tyndall received the Rumford medal in 1869. Nine memoirs on these subjects were published in the 'Philosophical Transactions,' and many additional papers in other journals. They have been gathered together in 'Contributions to Molecular Physics in the Domain of Radiant Heat' (see below). This volume also includes a series of striking experiments on the decomposition of vapours by light, in the course of which the blue of the firmament and the polarisation of sky-light—illustrated on skies artificially produced—were shown to be due to excessively fine particles floating in our atmosphere.

While engaged upon the last-mentioned inquiry, Tyndall observed that a luminous beam, passing through the moteless air of his experimental tube, was invisible. It occurred to him that such a beam might be utilised to detect the presence of germs in the atmosphere: air incompetent to scatter light, through the absence of all floating particles, must be free from bacteria and their germs. Numerous experiments showed 'optically pure' air to be incapable of developing bacterial life. In properly protected vesicle infusions of fish, flesh, and vegetable, freely exposed after boiling to air rendered moteless by subsidence, and declared to be so by the invisible passages of a powerful electric beam, remained permanently pure and unaltered; whereas the identical liquids, exposed afterwards to ordinary dust-laden air, soon swarmed with bacteria. Three extensive investigations into the behaviour of putrefactive organisms were made by Tyndall, mainly with the view of removing such vagueness as still lingered in the public mind in 1875-6, regarding the once widely received doctrine of spontaneous generation. Among the new results arrived at, the following are noteworthy: bacteria are killed below 100° C., but their desiccated germs—those of the hay bacillus in particular—may retain their vitality after several hours' boiling. By a process which he called 'discontinuous heating,' whereby the germs, in the order of their development, were successively destroyed before starting into active life, he succeeded in sterilising nutritive liquids containing the most resistant germs. This method, since universally adopted by bacteriologists, has proved of great practical value. The medical faculty of Tübingen gave Tyndall the degree of M.D. in recognition of these researches. The original essays, written for the 'Philosophical Transactions,' are collected in 'Floating Matter of the Air' (see below).

In 1866 Tyndall had succeeded Faraday as scientific adviser to the Trinity House and board of trade. He held the post for seventeen years, and it was in connection with the elder brethren that his chief investigations on sound were undertaken, with a view to the establishment of fog signals upon our coasts. Many conflicting opinions were held as to the respective values of the various sound signals in use when Tyndall began his experiments at the South Foreland (19 May 1873). Very discordant results appeared at first, but all were eventually traced to variations of density in the atmosphere. Tyndall discovered that non-homogeneity of the atmosphere affects sound as cloudiness affects light. By streams of air differently heated, or saturated in different degrees with aqueous vapour, 'acoustic flocculence' is produced. Acoustic clouds, opaque enough to intercept sound altogether and to produce echos of great intensity, may exist in air of perfect visual transparency. Rain, hail, snow, and fog were found not sensibly to obstruct sound. The atmosphere was also shown to exercise a selective and continually varying influence upon sounds, being favourable to the transmission sometimes of the longer, sometimes of the shorter, sonorous waves. Tyndall recommended the steam siren used in the South Foreland experiments as, upon the whole, the most powerful fog signal yet tried in England. His memoir on the subject, presented to the Royal Society on 5 Feb. 1874, is summarised in the book on 'Sound' (see below). Passing mention should be made of the beautiful experiments on sensitive flames described in the same volume.

It was likewise in his capacity of scientific adviser that Tyndall was called upon, in 1869 and on many subsequent occasions, to report upon the gas system introduced by Mr. John Wigham of Dublin, the originator of several important steps in modern light-house illumination. Tyndall's inability, during a long series of years, to secure what he considered justice towards Mr. Wigham led him eventually to sever himself from colleagues to whom he was sincerely attached. He resigned his post on 28 March 1883 (see Nineteenth Century, July 1888; Fortnightly Review, December 1888 and February 1889; New Review, 1892).

As a lecturer Tyndall was famed for the charm and animation of his language, for lucidity of exposition, and singular skill in devising and conducting beautiful experimental illustrations. As a writer he did perhaps more than any other person of his time for the diffusion of scientific knowledge. By the publication of his lectures and essays he aimed especially at rendering intelligible to all, in non-technical language, the dominant scientific ideas of the century. His work has borne abundant fruit in inciting others to take up the great interests which possessed so powerful an attraction for himself. In 'Heat as a Mode of Motion' (see below), which has been regarded as the best of Tyndall's books, that difficult subject was for the first time presented in a popular form. The book on 'Light' gives the substance of lectures delivered in the United States in the winter of 1872-3. The proceeds of these lectures, which by judicious investment amounted in a few years to between 6,000*l.* and 7,000*l.*, were devoted to the encouragement of science in the United States.

His views upon the great question as to the relation between science and theological opinions are best given in his presidential address to the British Association at Belfast in 1874, which occasioned much controversy at the time (reprinted, with essays on kindred subjects, in 'Fragments of Science,' vol. ii.) The main purpose of that address was to maintain the claims of science to discuss all such questions fully and freely in all their bearings.

On 29 Feb. 1876 Tyndall married Louisa, eldest daughter of Lord Claud Hamilton, who became his companion in all things. In 1877 they built a cottage at Bel Alp, on the northern side of the Valais, above Brieg. There they spent their summers amid his favourite haunts. In 1886 they built what Tyndall called 'a retreat for his old age' upon the summit of Hind Head, on the Surrey moors, then a very retired district. Sleeplessness and weakness of digestion—ills from which he had suffered more or less all his life—increased upon him in later years, and caused him to resign his post at the Royal Institution in March 1887. His later years were for the most part spent at Hind Head. Repeated attacks of severe illness, unhappily, prevented the execution of the many plans he had laid out for his years of retirement. In 1893 he returned greatly benefited from a three months' sojourn in the Alps. But a dose of chloral, accidentally administered, brought all to a close on 4 Dec. 1893.

Tyndall's single-hearted devotion to science and indifference to worldly advantages were but one manifestation of a noble and generous nature. A resolute will and lofty principles, always pointing to a high ideal, were in him associated with great tenderness and consideration for others. His chivalrous sense of justice led him not unfrequently—irrespective of nationality or even of personal acquaintance, and often at great cost of time and trouble to himself—to take up the cause of men whom he deemed to have been unfairly treated or overlooked in respect to their scientific merits. He thus vindicated the claim of the unfortunate German physician, Dr. Julius Robert Mayer, to have been the first to lay down clearly the principle of the conservation of energy and to point out its universal application; and succeeded in obtaining his recognition by the scientific world in spite of eminent opposition. The same spirit appeared in his defence of Rendu's title to a share in the explanation of glacier movement, and of Wigham's services in regard to lighthouses.

Tyndall took a warm interest in some great political questions. He sided strongly with the liberal unionists in opposing Mr. Gladstone's home-rule policy.

Tyndall was of middle height, sparely built, but with a strength, toughness, and flexibility of limb which qualified him to endure great fatigue and achieve the most difficult feats as a mountaineer. His face was rather stern and strongly marked, but the sharp features assumed an exceedingly pleasing expression when his sympathy was touched, and the effect was heightened by the quality of his voice. His eyes were grey-blue, and his hair, light-brown in youth, was abundant and of very fine texture. He had generally, like Faraday, to bespeak a hat on account of the unusual length of his head. A medallion of Tyndall, executed by Woolner in 1876, is perhaps the best likeness that exists of him.

Tyndall's works have been translated into most European languages. In Germany (where Helmholtz and Wiedemann undertook the translations and wrote prefaces) they are read almost as much as in England. Some thousands of his books are sold yearly in America, and a few translations have been made into the languages of India, China, and Japan.

In the Royal Society's catalogue of scientific papers 145 entries appear under Tyndall.

dall's name between 1850 and 1883, indicating approximately the number of his contributions to the 'Philosophical Transactions,' the 'Philosophical Magazine,' the 'Proceedings' of the Royal Society and of the Royal Institution, and other scientific journals. A great variety of subjects besides those glanced at above occupied his attention. They are for the most part dealt with in the miscellaneous essays collected in 'Fragments of Science' and 'New Fragments.' The essence of his teaching is contained in the following publications: 1. 'The Glaciers of the Alps, being a Narrative of Excursions and Ascents, an Account of the Origin and Phenomena of Glaciers, and an Exposition of the Physical Principles to which they are related,' 1860; reprinted in 1896; translated for the first time into German in 1898. 2. 'Mountaineering in 1861: a vacation tour,' 1862 (mostly repeated in 'Hours of Exercise'). 3. 'Heat considered as a Mode of Motion,' 1863; fresh editions, each altered and enlarged, in 1865, 1868, 1870, 1875; the sixth edition, 1880, was stereotyped. 4. 'On Sound,' a course of eight lectures, 1867; 3rd edit., with additions, 1875; 4th edit., revised and augmented, 1883; 5th edit., revised, 1893. 5. 'Faraday as a Discoverer,' 1868; 5th edit., revised 1894. 6. 'Researches on Diamagnetism and Magne-crystallic Action, including the question of Diamagnetic Polarity,' 1870; third and smaller edition, 1888. 7. 'Fragments of Science for Unscientific People: a series of Detached Essays, Lectures, and Reviews,' 1871; augmented in the first five editions; from 6th edit., 1879, in 2 vols. 8. 'Hours of Exercise in the Alps,' 1871; 2nd edit. 1871; 3rd edit. 1873; a reprint is now in hand (1898). 9. 'Contributions to Molecular Physics in the Domain of Radiant Heat' (memoirs from the 'Philosophical Transactions' and 'Philosophical Magazine,' with additions), 1872. 10. 'The Forms of Water in Clouds and Rivers, Ice, and Glaciers' (International Scient. Ser.), 1872; 12th edit. 1897. 11. 'Six Lectures on Light, delivered in America in 1872-3' (1873); 5th edit. 1895. 12. 'Lessons in Electricity, at the Royal Institution,' 1876; 5th edit. 1892. 13. 'Essays on the Floating Matter of the Air in relation to Putrefaction and Infection,' 1881; 2nd edit. 1888. 14. 'New Fragments,' 1892; last edit. 1897. 15. 'Notes on Light: nine Lectures delivered in 1860,' 1870. 16. 'Notes on Electrical Phenomena and Theories, seven Lectures delivered in 1870,' 1870.

[A life is being prepared, based upon the materials, in the possession of Mrs. Tyndall, used in the above article. Among many contemporary notices (in some of which are slight inaccuracies) are: Proc. Roy. Soc. vol. lv. p. xviii. and Proc. Inst. Civil Engineers, cxvi. (session 1893-4), ii. 340, both by Sir Edward Frankland; Proc. Roy. Inst. (special meeting, 15 Dec. 1893), xiv. 161-8, by Sir James Crichton Browne; ib. xiv. 216-24, by Lord Rayleigh; Nineteenth Century, Jan. 1894, by Prof. Huxley; Fortnightly Rev. Feb. 1894, by Herbert Spencer; Times, 5 Dec. 1893; Journal Chemical Soc. lxx. 389; Physical Rev., i. 302. See also on Tyndall's retirement, Times, 8 April and 30 June 1887 (appreciation by Sir George Stokes.) L. C. T.

TYRAWLEY, LORDS. [See O'HARA, SIR CHARLES, first lord, 1640?-1724; O'HARA, JAMES, second lord, 1690-1773.]

TYRCONNEL, EARL and titular DUKE OF. [See TALBOT, RICHARD, 1630-1691.]

TYRIE, JAMES (1543-1597), jesuit theologian, born in 1543, was a younger son of David Tyrie of Drumkilbo, Perthshire. His family was connected by marriage with that of Lord Gray and of Lord Hume (DOUGLAS, Peerage, i. 670; Cal. Hatfield MSS. iv. 123). His eldest brother, David, married Margaret Fotheringham, embraced the reformed religion, and in 1567 signed the bond of association connected with the abdication of the queen and the appointment of Moray as regent. He died in March, and his son David was served heir of his father on 20 May 1572 (Retours, Perth, No. 27, apud LAING'S Knox).

James Tyrie was educated at St. Andrews University, and was, with other young Scotsmen, carried abroad by Edmund Hay [q. v.], who was acting as the companion and guide of the jesuit Nicolas de Gouda, papal envoy to Mary Stuart in 1562. He made a short stay at Louvain, where he conceived the idea of entering the Society of Jesus, into which he was admitted at Rome on 19 Aug. 1563, when he was twenty years of age. Meanwhile he had been sent from Rome to Paris to assist in the establishment there of the jesuit college of Clermont, where he resided for some twenty-five years as professor of philosophy and divinity, and subsequently as rector. From Paris he had corresponded with his brother David, with the object of winning him back to the Roman church. One of these controversial letters, dealing with the question of the visibility of the church, was submitted at the close of 1566 to John Knox in order that he might write a reply to it. This Knox did at once, but for some unexplained reason he set aside his manuscript until shortly before his death in 1572, when he printed it at St. Andrews under the title 'An Answer to a Letter of a Jesuit named Tyrie, be Johne Knox.' In this little treatise the whole text of Tyrie's letter is printed paragraph by paragraph, each of which is followed by Knox's reply. The jesuit immediately published a rejoinder, the preface of which is 'daitit at Parie the 8 of Merche 1573,' that is, after the death of Knox, and twelve months after that of David Tyrie, to whom the original letter was written. Tyrie's book was entitled 'The Refutation of ane Answer made be Schir Johne Knox to ane Letter send be James Tyrie to his vmquihle brother. Sett furth be James Tyrie, Parisiie, 1573.' It appears to have created some stir (LESLEY, Historie, ii. 470). The general assembly in 1574 appointed a committee to revise and report upon an answer to it drawn up by John Duncanson, and three years later George Hay (d. 1588) [q. v.] submitted to the assembly another answer; but neither came to light; and, according to the Roman catholic controversialist John Hamilton (J. 1568-1609) [q. v.], William Christison, the minister of Dundee, had the jesuit's book burnt at the market cross. In the spring of 1574 Andrew Melville, on his road from Geneva to Scotland, was induced by Lord Ogilvy at Paris to meet Father Tyrie, and Melville was persuaded by him to enter upon a public disputation, which continued for several days (McCRUE, Life of Melville, ed. 1856, p. 26). At Clarmont College Tyrie had at one time for his colleagues two other prominent Scotsmen, his former friend Edmund Hay and James Gordon. During the siege of Paris in 1590 he was rector of the college, but apparently he did not take any conspicuous part in the political agitation of his jesuit brethren. In that same year he was sent by the French province to Rome, where he was appointed assistant for France and Germany to the general of the order, Aquaviva, an appointment which was confirmed by the fifth general congregation of the society in 1593.

The name of Father Tyrie's nephew, Thomas, a zealous catholic layman, frequently appears in the political correspondence of the time, and in 1593 Father Tyrie himself was brought in connection with the mysterious affair of the Spanish Blanks, as one who, with Father William Crichton [q. v.], was to have filled up the papers signed by the catholic lords (CALDERWOOD, v. 229). On the other hand, according to Mackenzie (Scots Writers, iii. 424), it was through his influence that the fifth congregation passed the decree which strictly prohibbited members of the society from any intermeddling with affairs of state. Although he published little, Tyrie earned a great reputation abroad for learning and ability, while his protestant countryman David Buchanan [q. v.] (De Scriptoribus Scotis, Bannatyne Club) speaks also in high terms of his personal character and virtues, extolling particularly his singular modesty, gentleness, and charity. He died at Rome on 20 March 1597, leaving behind him several manuscripts, among them a commentary on Aristotle.

On the doubtful and contradictory evidence of Dempster (cf. Mendicabula Repressa, 1620, p. 50; Apparatus, 1622, p. 55; Hist. Eccles. 1627, p. 626), a short treatise 'De Antiquitate Christianæ Religionis apud Scotos,' published under the name of George Thomson, first at Rome in 4to in 1594, and again in the same year in 12mo at Douai, and afterwards inserted by Possevinus in the third edition of his 'Bibliotheca Selecta' (Oologne, 1607), has been attributed to Father Tyrie. To a manuscript copy of this treatise at Blairs College is added a report on the state of religion in Scotland, presented to Clement VIII by the jesuit priests in Scotland (first printed by Father Stevenson in an English translation made from a Latin copy in the Barberini MSS. for his History of Mary Stuart, p. 105); and this also has in consequence been attributed to Tyrie without sufficient grounds.

[Best and fullest account in Laing's Knox, vi. 474; Ribadeneyra, Bibliotheca S. J.; Bellesheim's History, ed. Hunter Blair, ii. 344, iii. 225, 243; Forbce-Leith's Narratives of Scottish Catholics, p. 57; Foley's Records S. J., iii. 726; Cal. State Papers, Scotland, pp. 424, 596, 615, 683, 715; Piaget's Jésuites en France, p. 140; Prat's Maldonat, pp. 375, 402, 468.] T. G. L.

TYRONE, EARLS OF. [See O'NEILL, CON BAOACH, first earl, 1484?-1559?; O'NEILL, HUGH, 1540?-1616, and O'NEILL, SHANE, second earls, 1530?-1567; POWER, RICHARD, first earl of the Power family, 1630-1690.]

TYRRELL, ANTHONY (1552-1610?), renegade priest and spy, born in 1552, was son of George Tyrrell. His grandfather, Sir Thomas Tyrrell, who married Constance Blount, the daughter of Lord Mountjoy, was great-great-grandson of Sir John Tyrrell [q. v.] The family was catholic in Mary's reign and in favour with the queen. After the accession of Elizabeth George retired with his wife and children to the Netherlands, where they fell into extreme poverty.

Anthony, after graduating B.A. in some university, and being unable to pursue his studies for want of money, came over to England to beg from his relatives. He was seized as a recusant, but after some months' imprisonment obtained his release through the favour apparently of Lord Burghley, and he again went abroad. He was one of the first students who entered the newly founded college at Rome, and at the age of twenty-seven he took the college oath, 23 April 1579. In less than two years he was ordained priest and sent upon the English mission, where on 29 April 1581 he was captured and thrown into the Gatehouse. He, however, broke prison and was again at large in January 1582. He now (1584) travelled abroad, and revisited Rome in company with the seminary priest John Ballard [q. v.]

On his return to England in 1585 Tyrrell became mixed up with the strange practices of Father Weston, S.J., Robert Dibdale, and others, in the alleged casting out of devils in the house of Lord Vaux at Hackney, and at Sir George Peckham's at Denham ('Devil Hunting in Elizabethan England,' Nineteenth Century, March 1894). Tyrrell, it seems, wrote some account of these prodigies, or at least had a hand in the so-called 'Book of Miracles' attributed to Weston, extracts from which have been preserved by Dr. Samuel Harsnett [q. v.] The chief actors in this affair were arrested or dispersed in the midsummer of 1586; and Tyrrell, described by Father Southwell as 'a man that hath done much good,' was taken prisoner for the third time and lodged in the counter in Wood Street, 4 July. For a moment he maintained the genuineness of the alleged supernatural phenomena in which he had taken part, and expressed his grief when the knives, rusty nails, and other objects which he declared had been extracted from the cheeks or stomachs of the possessed women and had been found in his trunk, were taken away from him by the pursuivants. He, however, presently opened communication with Burghley; and a few weeks later the arrest of his friend Ballard so alarmed him that, to secure his own safety and gain the favour of the government, he made at several times (27, 30, 31 Aug., 2, 3 Sept.) secret disclosures regarding the Babington conspirators, Mary Stuart, the pope, and a number of his clerical brethren, mixing up with some genuine and valuable information much that was mere guesswork or absolute fiction. Before long he avowed himself to be a sincere convert to protestantism, and professed a desire to make satisfaction for his former errors by giving information of popish practices. He was accordingly in September removed to the Clink gaol, in order that he might have better scope for acting his chosen part of spy and informer among the many catholic prisoners there, and shortly afterwards he was granted liberty abroad for the same purpose. Meanwhile he was encouraged by Justice Young to continue saying mass and hearing confessions, and Lord Burghley wrote to him 'Your dissimulation is to a good end.' When at last the suspicions of the catholics were aroused, Tyrrell asked permission to profess openly his conversion; and it was resolved that he should receive catechetical instruction and license to preach from the archbishop of Canterbury.

But Tyrrell's conscience was meanwhile smitten by the exhortations of a priest who had detected his treacheries, and before encountering the archbishop he obtained leave of absence for a few weeks on the plea of private business. He at once fled north to Leith, and thence took ship to the continent, having previously written a long letter to the queen, retracting all his former accusations against his brethren and renouncing his protestantism (printed by SRRYE, Annals, vol. ii. pt. ii. p. 426). He also wrote a full and detailed confession, which came into the possession of Father Parsons, and was by him being prepared for the press, when Tyrrell, with no apparent reason, after a few months slipped back into England, and there fell or threw himself into the hands of his former masters. This retraction must evidently be received with as much caution as his former charges. The government, however, now insisted on his making at St. Paul's Cross a public recantation of his late apostasy and a reaffirmation of his original statements. This he was apparently ready to do, but on the appointed day, Sunday, 31 Jan. 1588, on mounting the pulpit in the presence of a large crowd of both catholics and protestants, he unexpectedly began a speech in the opposite sense. He was thereupon violently interrupted, rescued with difficulty from the angry mob, hurried to Newgate, and thence to close confinement in the Counter, but not before he had contrived to scatter among the people copies of his intended discourse, which was triumphantly published in the same year by John Bridgewater [q. v.] Tyrrell again persevered as a penitent catholic for about six months, being for part of that time fortified in his resolution by a fellow prisoner of the same faith with whom he held daily converse through a chink in the wall of his cell. But he then recurred to the church of England, professed to Burghley his 'true repentance' in October, and at last, on 8 Dec. 1688, successfully delivered at Paul's Cross the sermon which should have been preached in the preceding January. It was printed with the title 'The recantation and abjuration of Anthony Tyrrell (some time priest of the English College in Rome, but now by the great mercy of God converted and become a true professor of His Word) pronounced by himself at Paul's Cross after the sermon made by Mr. Pownoll, preacher . . . At London 1688.'

Tyrrell now retired into private life as an Anglican clergyman, took a wife, and held the vicarage of Southminster and the parsonage of Dengie. In 1696 he was acting as chaplain to Lady Bindon, but in the autumn of that year he fell into disreputable company, and tried to escape abroad with his new friends under cover of a false passport. The government were on the watch. He was caught, and underwent in the Marshalsea his sixth imprisonment. Here he remained for at least two months, but was probably soon afterwards released by means of his old patron, Justice Young, who, 'moved by the pitiful request and suit of his [Tyrrell's] wife,' and finding him 'constant in God's true religion and desirous to continue his preaching,' interceded on his behalf with Sir Robert Cecil. In 1692 Tyrrell, together with several other witnesses, appeared before the bishop of London and the royal commissioners to give evidence regarding the exorcisms of 1685, which he did in the form of a written statement, more sober in style and more credible than most of his previous declarations. This 'Confession of M.A. Anthonie Tyrrell, Clerke, writton with his owne hand and avouched upon his oath the 15 of June 1692,' was printed in the following year, together with 'The copies of the severall examinations and confessions of the parties pretending to be possessed and dispossessed by Weston the Jesuit and his adherents,' in the 'Declaration of Egregious Popish Impostures,' published by the before-mentioned Dr. Harsnett, then chaplain to the bishop of London, and afterwards archbishop of York. Tyrrell here remarks that the charges of treason which he had brought against Babington and afterwards retracted were in the event not only fully justified, 'but a great more than ever I knew or dreamed of.'

Tyrrell passed through one more change. Father Weston, who died in 1615, relates in his 'Autobiography' (printed in Morris's 'Troubles,' 3rd ser. p. 207) that in his old age Tyrrell was persuaded by his brother to retire into Belgium, where he died reconciled to the Roman church. The exact date is not known.

[The true and wonderful story of the lamentable fall of Anthonie Tyrrell, priest from the Catholic faith, written by his own hand, before which is prefixed a preface showing the causes of publishing the same to the world. This work of Father Parsons, continuing the story down to the first speech made at St. Paul's Cross, was naturally left unfinished, and was printed for the first time by Father Morrie, with introduction and notes, in Troubles of our Catholic Forefathers, 2nd ser. 1876. In this volume the chief examinations or confessions, and the correspondence of Tyrrell with the queen, Lord Burghley, and Justice Young (excepting the documents regarding Tyrrell's last imprisonment, among the Hatfield Papers, which Father Morrie had not seen), are transcribed or quoted by him mainly from the P.R.O. Mary Queen of Scots. Tyrrell's first letter to Burghley is in the British Museum, Lansdowne MS. 50, n. 78. Exemplar scripti eundem son Palinode quam Ant. Tyrellus, &c., inserted in some copies only of Dr. Bridgewater's Concertatio (at end of pt. ii, unpagged following sig. a 4), Trèves, 1688.]

T. G. L.

TYRRELL, FREDERICK (1793-1848), surgeon, fourth son of Timothy Tyrrell, remembrancer of the city of London, was born in 1793. He received his education at Henry VII's School, Reading, when Richard Valpy [q. v.] was headmaster, and in 1811 or 1812 he was articled to (Sir) Astley Paston Cooper [q. v.], and attended the practice of the united hospitals of Guy and St. Thomas. After the battle of Waterloo the hospitals at Brussels were crowded with the wounded, and Tyrrell with many other young Englishmen hurried over to afford assistance. He was admitted a member of the College of Surgeons in 1816, and he then proceeded to Edinburgh, where he spent a year. In 1820 he was appointed assistant surgeon to the London Eye Infirmary, now the Ophthalmic Hospital in Moorfields, and in 1822 he was elected a surgeon to St. Thomas's Hospital. In the same year he settled in New Bridge Street, where he resided until he moved into a larger house in the adjacent Chatham Place a few years before his death. When the two schools of St. Thomas's and Guy's Hospital were divided in 1825, Tyrrell accepted the lectureship of anatomy and surgery at the Aldersgate Street school of medicine. This position he gave up a few years later when he became lecturer on anatomy and physiology at St. Thomas's Hospital.

He was elected a member of the council of the College of Surgeons in 1838, and filled the office of Arris and Gale lecturer on anatomy and physiology from 1838 to 1841. In 1840 he published his only independent work, that on 'Dissases of the Eyes,' in two volumes. He died suddenly on 23 May 1843 at the City auction mart. In 1822 he married a daughter of Samuel Lovick Cooper, a niece of Sir Astley Paston Cooper [q. v.]

Tyrrell was an admirable surgeon, and was for many years the mainstay of his surgical colleagues at the hospitals to which he was attached.

Tyrrell edited Sir Astley Cooper's 'Lectures on the Principles and Practice of Surgery,' London, 1824-7, 2 vols. 8vo. The publication of these lectures led to the suit of Tyrrell v. Wakley (editor of the 'Lancet'), in which Thomas Wakley [q. v.] was cast in damages to the amount of 50*l*.

[A manuscript account from personal knowledge and family information drawn up by the late James Dixon, F.R.C.S. Engl.; obituary notice in South's Hunterian Oration; the Lancet for 1843-4, i. 698; 'Pencilings of Mr. Tyrrell,' The Medical Times, vii. 283; see also Sprigge's Life of Wakley, 1897, chap. xiii.]

D.A.P.

TYRRELL or TYRELL, SIR JAMES (d. 1502), supposed murderer of the princes in the Tower, was the eldest son of William Tyrrell of Gipping, Suffolk, by Margarnst, daughter of Robert Darcy of Maldon. Sir John Tyrrell [q. v.] was his grandfather. James Tyrrell was a strong Yorkist. He was knighted after the battle of Tewkesbury on 3 May 1471, was appointed to conduct the Countess of Warwick to the north of England in 1473, and served as member of parliament for Cornwall in December 1477. An order to pay 10*l*. signed by him and dated 1 April 1478, has been preserved and is in Brit. Mus. Addit. MS. 18675, f. 1. In the war with Scotland he fought under Richard, then Duke of Gloucester, and was by him made a knight-banneret on 24 July 1482. The same year, when the office of constable, held by Richard, was put into commission, Tyrrell was one of those appointed to execute it. At the coronation of Richard III he took part in some capacity. His brother Thomas was master of the horse, and he just afterwards was made master of the henchmen; and, no doubt on his brother resigning what was meant to be a temporary office, also master of the horse.

The whole interest of Tyrrell's career centres round the murder of the two sons of Edward IV. The story, as told by the author of the 'Historie of Kyng Rycharde the Thirde,' makes Richard send John Green to Sir Robert Brackenbury, the constable of the Tower, with orders that the deed should be done by him. This was while Richard was on his progress to Gloucester. On Brackenbury's refusal, Green returned to Richard at Warwick, and while the king was in a state of anxious uncertainty, a page suggested that Tyrrell would do what was wanted. The writer explains that Tyrrell had been kept in the background by Ratcliffe and Catesby, and was therefore likely to stick at nothing that could secure his advantage. Tyrrell was then sent to the Tower with a letter to Brackenbury, commanding him to give up the keys for a night. The two princes were accordingly smothered by Miles Forest, one of their keepers, 'a felowe fleshed in murder before time,' and John Dighton, Tyrrell's horsekeeper, 'a big, brode, square, strong knave.' Tyrrell, having seen that the murder was carried out, ordered the bodies to be buried at the stair foot, and rode back to Richard, 'who gave hym gret thanks, and, as som say, there made him knight.'

This account contains much matter for dispute and involves a larger question, the character of Richard III. Sir Clements Markham has attempted to fix the guilt of the murder on Henry VII, but his contentions have been opposed by Mr. Gardner, whose view is accepted by Professor Busch. In either case Tyrrell is admitted to have been the instrument (see English Historical Review, vi. 250, 441, 806, 818; Busch, England under the Tudors, p. 819).

Tyrrell's reward was certainly not in proportion to his service. He became a knight of the king's body, and on 5 Nov. 1483 received commissions to array the men of Wales against Buckingham. He was also a commissioner for the forfeited estates of Buckingham and others in Wales and the marches. On 10 April 1484 he benefited at the expense of the traitor Sir John Fogge. On 9 Aug. 1484 he was made steward of the duchy of Cornwall for life, and on 18 Sept. 1484 he became sheriff of the lordship of Wenlock, steward of the lordships of Newport Wenlock, Kevoeth Meredith, Lavenitherry, and Lanthoesant, for life. He also was allowed to enter on the estates of Sir Thomas Arundel, a relative of his wife. At some time in the reign he was made one of the chamberlains of the exchequer.

He is said to have wavered in his allegiance to Richard III towards the end of his reign, but of this there is no proof, and Richard seems to have employed him in some unknown capacity in Flanders. Just before Bosworth he was clearly in the king's confidence, as, though holding a command in Glamorgan and Morgannook, he was sent to Guisnes, certainly no place for trimmers.

Henry VII, however, took him into favour, or at all events employed him. He lost the post of chamberlain of the exchequer and his Welsh offices, but on 19 Feb. 1485-6 he was made sheriff of Glamorgan and Morgannook, with all it involved, including the constableness of Cardiff Castle, for life, at a salary of 100*l.* a year. He received a general pardon on 16 June 1486, another on 16 July following. These two pardons are important, as Sir Clements Markham considers that it was between their dates that the murder of the princes took place.

On 15 Dec. 1486 Tyrrell is mentioned as lieutenant of the castle of Guisnes in a commission appointing ambassadors to treat with those of Maximilian, and on 30 Aug. 1487 he received the stewardship of the lordship of Ogmores in South Wales. A curious commission of 23 Feb. 1487-8 recites that for his services he is to be recompensed of the issues of Guisnes for property he had held in Wales at the beginning of the reign, and a schedule is annexed showing what that property had been. He is also here mentioned as a knight of the body. Tyrrell was present at the battle of Dixmude in 1489 and took a prominent part in the ceremonial attending the making of the peace of Etaples in 1492; he was also present at the creation of Prince Henry as Duke of York in 1494.

In the summer of 1499 Edmund de la Pole, earl of Suffolk [q. v.], fled from England, and, on his way to the Netherlands, he stayed some time with Tyrrell at Guisnes. Henry was merciful or politic, and sent in September 1499 Sir Richard Guildford [q. v.] and Richard Hatton to persuade the earl to return, and, though he had left Guisnes, he did so; Tyrrell was ordered to come with him. He may have been regarded with suspicion, but nevertheless he was one of those prominent in 1501 at the reception of Catherine of Aragon. About July or August 1501 Suffolk fled again, and Tyrrell was induced to surrender Guisnes by a trick, which is alluded to in a letter of Suffolk written just after Tyrrell's death, and long afterwards in a letter from Sandys to Cromwell of 19 Jan. 1530-7 (cf. Letters and Papers of Henry VIII. xii. i. 151). With his son he was imprisoned in the Tower. He had helped in the first flight, and doubtless through his agents Henry had certain knowledge of his treason. He was beheaded on Tower Hill on 6 May 1502, and attainted 1503-4.

Knowing that he was to die, Tyrrell made, it is said while in the Tower, a confession of his guilt as to the princes; Dighton, his accomplice, was also examined and confessed. It is the substance of this confession that forms the history of the murder as we know it, though the text has not been preserved. He had by his wife Anne, daughter of Sir John Arundel of Cornwall, three sons; Thomas, his heir, who was restored in blood; James, and William. One pedigree given by Davy mentions a daughter Anne and does not give William (cf. Brit. Mus. Addit. MS. 5509, f. 41).

[For genealogy see Davy's Suffolk Pedigrees (Brit. Mus. Addit. MS. 19152); Visitations of Essex, Harl. Soc. pp. 100-11; Gairdner's Richard III, Ramsay's Lancaster and York (vol. ii.), Bacon's Henry VII, and Busch's England under the Tudors, supply the historical part of Tyrrell's life. On the murder in the Tower, the articles in the English Historical Review, Archæologia (i. 361 &c.), Kennett's History of England (i. 552, notes on Sir George Buc, one of the early apologists for Richard III), the History of Richard III's reign (attributed to Sir Thomas More), the Continuator of Croyland in Gale's Hist. Angl. Script. (i. 568), Polydore Vergil, Rous, and the French evidence in Commines, and the Proceedings of the States-General at Tours in 1484 are the most important. The grants in Richard III's reign are to be found in App. ii. 9th Rep. Deputy-keeper of Public Records. See also Return of Members of Parliament, i. 368 (no returns have been preserved for the reigns of Richard III and Henry VII); Metcalfe's Knights, pp. 3, 6; Rolls of Parliament, vol. vi.; Letters and Papers of Richard III and Henry VII, and Campbell's Materials for the Reign of Henry VII, both in Rolls Ser.; information furnished by A. P. J. Archbold, esq.] W. A. J. A.

TYRRELL, JAMES (1642-1718), historical writer, born on 5 May 1642 in Great Queen Street in the parish of St. Giles-in-the-Fields, Middlesex, was the eldest son of Sir Timothy Tyrrell of Shotover, near Oxford, by his wife Elizabeth, sole daughter and heiress of James Usher (1580-1656) [q. v.], archbishop of Armagh. James Tyrrell was educated in the free school at Camberwell, Surrey, and was admitted a student at Gray's Inn on 7 Jan. 1655-6. On 15 Jan. 1657 he matriculated from Queen's College, Oxford, and was created M.A. on 28 Sept. 1668. In 1666 he was called to the bar by the society of the Inner Temple, but, says Wood, 'made no profession of the common law.' He subsequently retired to his estate at Oakley, near Brill in Buckinghamshire, and became a deputy lieutenant and justice of the peace of that county, in which offices he continued until deprived by James II in 1687 for refusing to support the 'declaration of indulgence.'

In 1681 Tyrrell, who was an intimate friend of John Locke, the philosopher, and who shared his political views, published a small volume entitled 'Patriarcha non Monarcha, or the Patriarch unmonarched' (London, 8vo), in which he advocated the principle of a limited monarchy, and controverted the doctrines of passive obedience and non-resistance. It was intended primarily as a reply to Sir Robert Filmer's 'Patriarcha, or the natural Power of Kings' (London, 1680, 8vo), and was subscribed 'Philalethes.' Tyrrell's opinions were further elaborated by him in a series of fourteen political dialogues published between 1692 and 1702, in which, besides dealing with the more abstract subjects of parliamentary rights and regal prerogative, he examined minutely the constitutional questions raised during the reigns of the later Stuarts and at the time of the Revolution. The dialogues are conducted with some learning and much pedantry. They form a valuable résumé of the whig theory of the English constitution. They were collected into one volume folio in 1718, under the title 'Bibliotheca Politica.' A second edition appeared in 1827.

In later life Tyrrell resided chiefly at Shotover, in order to be near the libraries at Oxford. He was engaged upon a 'General History of England, both Ecclesiastical and Civil,' which he intended to bring down to the reign of William III. At the time of his death, however, he had issued only three volumes folio, which appeared between 1698 and 1704. These carried the work to the death of Richard II. The work was written with the view of confuting the monarchical opinions expressed by Robert Brady [q. v.] in his 'Compleat History of England,' and of establishing the historical continuity of the representation of the commons in the English legislature (Locke, Works, 1812, iii. 272-3). Like other works written in support of a theory, it was valuable only so long as its contentions were not admitted. It contains copious transcripts from the older historians and chroniclers, but it is cumbrous and ill-digested.

Tyrrell died at Shotover on 7 June 1718, and was buried in Oakley church. On 18 Jan. 1669-70 he married Mary, daughter and heiress of Sir Michael Hutchinson of Fladbury in Worcestershire (CHURCH, London Marriage Licenses). By her he had a son, James Tyrrell, who, entering the army, attained the rank of lieutenant-general, and was member of parliament for Boroughbridge from 1722 till his death on 30 Aug. 1742. The Tyrrell estates then descended to his kinsman, Augustus Schutz. Besides the works mentioned, Tyrrell was the author of 'A brief Disquisition on the Law of Nature,' London, 1692, 8vo; 2nd edit. London, 1701, 8vo. This work was an abridgment of the treatise 'De Legibus Naturæ Disquisitio Philosophica' by Richard Cumberland (1681-1718) [q. v.], bishop of Peterborough, written in refutation of Hobbes's theories. He also wrote a dedication to Charles II for Usher's 'Power communicated by God to the Prince,' London, 1661, 4to; 2nd edit. London, 1683, 8vo; and in 1686 printed at the end of Parr's 'Life of Archbishop Usher' a vindication of his grandfather's opinions and actions from the aspersions thrown on them by Peter Heylyn in his pamphlet 'Respondet Petrus,' London, 1658, 8vo. The vindication was reprinted as an appendix in the first volumes of Elrington's edition of Usher's works. Tyrrell translated 'Toxaris, or a Dialogue of Friendship,' for the translation of Lucian of Samosata, in four volumes, which appeared in 1711. To him have also been attributed: 1. 'Mr. Milton's Character of the Long Parliament,' London, 1681, 4to. 2. 'His Majesty's Government vindicated,' London, 1718, 8vo. Hearn says that he believes him to be the author of the life of Locke in the supplement to Jeremy Collier's translation of Moreri's 'Great Historical Dictionary' (1705). In 1707 Tyrrell presented six volumes of 'Collectanea' of Archbishop Usher's to the Bodleian Library. His own library was preserved at Shotover House until 20 Oct. 1865, when it was sold by public auction. Many of his books contained valuable annotations (Notes and Queries, 4th ser. v. 490, 610). A volume of Locke's 'Essay concerning the Human Understanding,' with copious manuscript notes, is in the British Museum Library.

[Wood's Athens Oxon. ed. Bliss, iv. 520; Hearne's Collectanea, ed. Doble and Rennie, passim; Biographia Britannica, 1763; Foster's Alumni Oxon. 1600-1714; Foster's Register of Admissions at Gray's Inn, p. 276.] E. I. C.

TYRRELL, SIR JOHN (d. 1437), speaker of the House of Commons, was the son of Sir Thomas Tyrrell of Herne in Essex by his wife Elianor, daughter of John Flambarde. The family claimed descent from Walter Tirel [q. v.], the reputed slayer of William Rufus. John was returned to parliament for the county of Essex in 1411, and also sat in that which met at Westminster on 14 May 1413. On the outbreak of the French war he served under Henry V in France, was present at Agincourt among the king's retinue, and was appointed by him surveyor of the carpenters of the new works at Calais. He represented Essex in the parliaments of 1417 and 1419 and in the first parliament of 1421, and in those of 1422, 1425, 1427, 1429, 1431, 1433, and 1437. In 1423 he was appointed sheriff of Essex and Hertfordshire. In the parliament of 1427 he was elected speaker of the House of Commons, and was again nominated to the same dignity in 1431 (Rolls of Parl. iv. 317, 368). On 9 March 1430-1 he was appointed by the king to attend him as one of his council in France, and on 23 April he was allowed pay for two men-at-arms and nine archers (NICOLAS, Acts of the Privy Council, iv. 82, 84). On 1 March 1431-2 he was acting as treasurer of the war in France, and on 13 July he is styled treasurer of the king's household (ib. pp. 109, 121). In April 1434 he took part in a great council held at Westminster by the Duke of Gloucester (ib. p. 212), and in 1437 he was chosen speaker of the lower house for the third time (Rolls of Parl. iv. 406). In March, however, he was compelled by illness to retire, and he was succeeded as speaker by William Burley [q. v.] Tyrrell died before 1 Sept. 1437 (Cal. Inquis. post mort. iv. 181). He was married to Eleanor, who was second daughter of Sir William de Coggeshall of Little Coggeshall Hall. He was succeeded in his estate by his son, Sir Thomas Tyrrell (d. 1476). Another son, William, was father of Sir James Tyrrell [q. v.], the alleged murderer of the princes in the Tower.

[Visitation of Essex, Harl. Soc.; Manning's Lives of the Speakers, 1850, pp. 77-9; Nicolas's Hist. of the Battle of Agincourt, 1832, p. 385; Rotuli Normannie, 1836, p. 348; Morant's Hist. of Essex, passim.] E. I. C.

TYRRELL, SIR THOMAS (1594-1672), judge, third son of Sir Edward Tyrrell of Thornton, Buckinghamshire, by his second wife, Margaret, third daughter of John Aston of Aston, Cheshire, relict of Timothy Egerton of Walgrave, Northamptonshire, was born in 1594. His great-grandfather, Humphrey Tyrrell, who acquired the manor of Thornton by marriage, belonged to the Essex family [see TYRRELL, SIR JOHN]. His eldest brother, Sir Timothy Tyrrell of Oakley, Buckinghamshire, master of the buckhounds to Charles I, died in 1633, leaving a son, Sir Timothy Tyrrell, who was governor of Cardiff under Lord Gerard in 1645 (SYMONDS, Diary, Camden Soc. p. 217).

Tyrrell was admitted in November 1612 a member of the Inner Temple, where he was called to the bar in 1621 and elected a benchman in 1659. On the passing of the militia ordinance he accepted from Lord Paget, 11 May 1642, the office of deputy lieutenant of Buckinghamshire, in which he was continued by Lord Wharton [see PAGET, WILLIAM, fifth LORD PAGET, and WHARTON, PHILIP, fourth LORD WHARTON]. First as captain and afterwards as colonel of horse, he served under Bedford and Essex. His regiment bore the brunt of the severe fighting before Lostwithiel on 21 Aug. 1644. He was one of the committee for Aylesbury, for which borough he stood for parliament in 1645, but was not elected. He was also one of the commissioners appointed by ordinance of 1656 (c. 12) to assess the proportion of the Spanish war tax leviable upon the county of Buckingham. The same year (22 Dec.) a petition from the tenants of his manor of Hanslope in that county, charging him with certain invasions of their customary rights and other misfeances, was read in parliament and dismissed, on the ground that the proper remedy was by action at law. In the parliament of 1659-1660 he represented Aylesbury, and in the former year was sworn (4 June) joint commissioner with John Bradshaw (1602-1659) [q. v.] and John Fountaine [q. v.] of the great seal for the term of five months, and voted serjeant-at-law (16 June). On 18 Jan. 1659-1660 he was reconstituted, with Fountaine and Sir Thomas Widdrington [q. v.], joint commissioner of the great seal, which in the interval had been held successively by Bulstrode Whitelocke and William Lenthall. By the Convention parliament, in which Tyrrell sat for Buckinghamshire, a fourth commissioner—Edward Montagu, second earl of Manchester, speaker of the House of Lords—was added on 5 May. The seal remained in the custody of the commissioners until 28 May, when they surrendered it to the speaker of the House of Commons. At Clarendon's instance Tyrrell was confirmed in the status of serjeant-at-law (4 July), knighted (16 July), appointed justice of the common pleas (27 July), and placed on the commission for the trial of the regicides, in which, however, he seems to have taken no active part. He was present at the meeting of the judges held at Serjeants' Inn on 23 April 1666 to discuss the several points of law involved in Lord Morley's case. He was a member of the court of summary jurisdiction established in 1667 to try causes between owners and occupiers of lands and tenements in the districts ravaged by the fire of London (18 & 19 Car. II, c. 7). In recognition of his services in this capacity the corporation of London caused his portrait to be painted by Michael Wright and placed in the Guildhall (1671).

Tyrrell died on 8 March 1671-2 at his seat,

Castletorpe, Hanslope, Buckinghamshire, his tenure of which had been confirmed by royal grant in June 1663 (Cal. State Papers, Dom. 1663-4, p. 188). His remains were interred in Castletorpe church, where a handsome monument, supporting his effigy in robes and coif, was erected by his third wife, Bridgit, daughter of Sir Edward Harrington, bart., of Ridlington, Rutland, widow of Sir John Gore. By his second wife (m. 1654), widow of Colonel Windebank, Tyrrell had no issue; by his third wife he had one son, James Tyrrell of Caldecote, Buckinghamshire. By his first wife, Frances (born Saunders), widow of Richard Grenville, he had issue two sons and two daughters. Thomas, the elder son, incurred his grave displeasure in 1663, and seems to have been disinherited (ib. 1663-4, p. 188). The estates passed to the younger son, Sir Peter Tyrrell, bart. (created 20 July 1663), who died in 1711, leaving by his second wife, Anne, daughter of Carew Raleigh, and granddaughter of Sir Walter Raleigh, an only son, Sir Thomas Tyrrell, bart., on whose death without issue in 1714 the baronetcy became extinct.

[Blount's Hist. of the Croke Family, Pedigree, No. 87; Lipscomb's Buckinghamshire, i. 546, ii. 16 et seq., iii. 119, iv. 89, 175; Lysons's Magna Britannia, i. 533, 648; Ormerod's Cheshire, ed. Helsby, i. 724; Gent. Mag. 1782, p. 561; Le Neve's Pedigrees of Knights (Hart. Soc.), p. 94; Burke's Extinct Baronetage; Whitelocke's Mom. pp. 680, 693; Nugent's Mem. of Hampden, ii. 161, 199, 204, 219, 458; Verney Papers (Camden Soc.), pp. 103, 119, 277, 281; King's Pamphlets, E 64, No. 1214; Lady Verney's Mem. of the Verney Family, iii. 445; Rushworth's Hist. Coll. p. liii, vol. ii. p. 710; Clarendon State Papers, iii. 485; Stowe MSS. 188 f. 10, 190 ff. 88, 123, 171; Tanner MS. 61, f. 80; Scobell's Acts, p. 400; Burton's Diary, i. 197; Ludlow's Mem. p. 282; Comm. Journal, ii. 638, 667, vii. 671, 687, viii. 14, 48; Siderfin's Rep. p. 8; Wynne's Serjeant-at-Law; Burnet's Own Time, fol. i. 176; Peppe's Diary, 5 Feb. 1659-60; Hardy's Cat. of Lord Chancellors; Collett's State Trials, v. 938, vi. 770; Cal. State Papers, Dom. 1637-8, 1644-5, 1658-9, 1660-4, 1666-70; Hist. MSS. Comm. 5th Rep. App. pp. 2, 68, 8th Rep. App. p. 6, 10th Rep. App. vi. 153; Sir John Kelynge's Crown Cases, ed. Loveland, p. 36; Foss's Lives of the Judges; Prince's Descr. Acc. of the Guildhall of the City of London, p. 79; Harvey's Account of the Great Fire in London in 1666; Memoirs of the Judges whose Portraits are preserved in the Guildhall. J. M. R.

TYRRELL, WALTER (A. 1100), reputed slayer of William Rufus. [See TYRREL.]

TYRWHITT, JOHN (1601-1671), jesuit. [See SPENNER.]

TYRWHITT, RICHARD Sr. JOHN (1827-1895), writer on art, eldest son of Robert Philip Tyrwhitt (1798-1886), a metropolitan police magistrate and author of 'Notices and Remains of the Family of Tyrwhitt,' 1872, and of legal works, by his wife Catherine Wigley, daughter of Henry St. John, was born on 19 March 1827. He matriculated from Christ Church, Oxford, on 15 May 1845, was a student from 1845 to 1850, tutor from 1852 to 1856, and rhetoric reader in 1858. He graduated B.A. in 1849 and M.A. in 1852. In 1851 he was ordained, and from 1858 to 1879 he held the vicarage of St. Mary Magdalen in Oxford. He had great artistic insight, and with a technical training would probably have developed high merit as a landscape-painter. He exhibited between 1864 and 1880 two watercolours at the Royal Academy and two at the Suffolk Street Gallery, and several of his paintings in watercolours now hang in the common-room of Christ Church, Oxford. He was a fervent admirer of John Ruskin, in whose favour he withdrew his candidature for the Slade professorship of fine arts in 1869. For many years he was a member of the committee for the decoration of St. Paul's Cathedral.

He died at 62 Banbury Road, Oxford, on 6 Nov. 1895. He married, first, on 28 June 1853, Eliza Ann, daughter of John Spencer Stanhope of Cannon Hall, Yorkshire. She died on 8 Sept. 1859, leaving a son, Walter Spencer Stanhope, a lieutenant in the Warwick militia. By a second marriage, on 2 Jan. 1861, to Caroline (d. 1883), youngest daughter of John Yorke of Bewerley Hall, Yorkshire, he had six children.

Tyrwhitt was a well-known writer on art and author of 'A Handbook of Pictorial Art' (1866; 2nd edit. 1868). In addition to many sermons, he published: 1. 'Concerning Clerical Powers and Duties,' 1861. 2. 'Christian Art and Symbolism, with Hints on the Study of Landscape,' 1872 (preface by Ruskin). 3. 'The Art Teaching of the Primitive Church,' 1874. 4. 'Our Sketching Club: Letters and Studies in Landscape Art, with a Reproduction of the Lessons and Woodcuts in Ruskin's "Elements of Drawing," 1874. 5. 'Hugh Heron, Ch. Ch.: an Oxford Novel,' 1880. 6. 'Greek and Gothic: Progress and Decay in the three Arts of Architecture, Sculpture, and Painting,' 1881. 7. 'The Natural Theology of Natural Beauty,' 1882. 8. 'Christian Ideals and Hopes: an Argument from Moral Beauty,' 1883. 9. 'An Amateur Art Book: Lectures,' 1886. 10. 'Tree Field Lyrics, chiefly descriptive,' 1888. To Mr. Francis Galton's 'Vacation Tourists,' 1864, he contributed an account of a visit to Sinai (pp. 327-66).

[Times, 9 Nov. 1895; Foster's Baronetage, 1888.]

G. C. B.

TYRWHITT or TIRWHIT, SIR ROBERT (d. 1428), judge, was the son of Sir William Tyrwhitt of Kettleby, Lincolnshire, by his wife, the daughter and heiress of John Grovall of Harpswell (TYRWHITT, Notices and Mem. of the Family of Tyrwhitt, pp. 7-14; Genealogist, v. 45). He was brought up to the law, and is mentioned as an advocate in the reign of Richard II. On 9 Oct. 1398 he was one of those who were given power of attorney by Henry, earl of Derby (afterwards Henry IV), on his banishment (RYMER, Fœdera, viii. 49), and he was also a member of the council of the duchy of Lancaster (WYLLIE, ii. 189). On Henry's accession in 1399 Tyrwhitt was promoted to be king's serjeant, and in 1403 was required to lend the king a hundred pounds to enable him to resist the Welsh and Scots rebels (NICOLAS, Acts P. C. i. 208). In April 1408 (not, as Foss says, 1409) he was made a judge of the king's bench and knighted. From January 1409-10 until his death he acted as trier of petitions in parliament. In 1411 a dispute broke out between Tyrwhitt and the tenants of William, lord de Ros, about a right of pasture at Melton Ross, near Wrawby, Lincolnshire. It was agreed to submit the quarrel to the arbitration of Sir William Gascoigne [q. v.] at Melton Ross; but on the day appointed Tyrwhitt, in spite of his judicial position, appeared at the head of five hundred armed men, denied that he had ever agreed to arbitrate, and drove off Lord de Ros's adherents. Tyrwhitt was subsequently required to submit himself to the king's decision, which was that he was publicly to apologise to De Ros, and to provide two fat oxen, two tuns of Gascon wine, and twelve fat sheep for consumption by De Ros's tenants (Rot. Parl. iii. 649 et seq.; FORTESQUE, Governance of England, p. 22; TYRWHITT, pp. 8-13; WYLLIE, History of Henry IV, iv. 180). Tyrwhitt nevertheless retained his position on the bench until his death on 6 Jan. 1427-8. He was buried in the chancel of Bigby church.

By his wife Alice, daughter of Sir Roger Kelke of Kelke, Yorkshire, Tyrwhitt had issue two sons: Sir William, who fought at Agincourt, 25 Oct. 1415, was thirty years old at his father's death, and succeeded to the Kettleby property; and John (d. 1432), who succeeded to his grandmother's estates at Harpswell. Tyrwhitt's descendants frequently acted as knights of the shire and sheriffs of Lincolnshire. One of them, Sir Robert, was attached to the household of Princess (afterwards Queen) Elizabeth, his wife being her governess (HAYNES, Burghley State Papers, passim). His great-grandson, Sir Philip (d. 1624), was created a baronet of the original creation on 29 June 1611; the dignity became extinct on the death of the sixth baronet in 1760.

[R. P. Tyrwhitt's Some Notices and Remains of the Family of Tyrwhitt, 1872; Rotuli Parl. iii. 623, 649-8, iv. 4, 16, 35, 63, 73, 93, 107, 170, 198, 261, 296, 363; Rymer's Fœdera, viii. 49, 584, 764, 763; Nicolas's Acts of the Privy Council, i. 208, iii. 283; Dugdale's Orig. Jurid.; Foss's Lives of the Judges; WYLLIE's Henry IV; Baker's Northamptonshire, i. 114; Burke's Ext. Baronets.]

A. F. P.

TYRWHITT, ROBERT (1735-1817), unitarian, born in London in 1735, was younger son of Robert Tyrwhitt (1698-1743), residentiary canon of St. Paul's, by his wife Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Edmund Gibson [q. v.], bishop of London. Thomas Tyrwhitt [q. v.] was his eldest brother. He entered as a pensioner at Jesus College, Cambridge, on 9 March 1753, and graduated B.A. in 1757, M.A. in 1760. On 3 Nov. 1759 he was admitted fellow of his college. His mind was early influenced by the theological writings of Samuel Clarke (1675-1729) [q. v.], but he went much further, renounced the doctrine of the Anglican articles, and took part with John Jebb [q. v.] in the movement (1771-2) for abolishing subscription at graduation. In 1777 he resigned his fellowship, and ceased to attend the college chapel, though still residing in college. On 5 Jan. 1784 he became a member of a unitarian 'Society for promoting the Knowledge of the Scriptures,' and contributed papers to the society's 'Commentaries and Essays,' vol. ii. No. vi. (1788). His income was narrow till, on the death (1786) of his brother Thomas, he came into considerable property, which he administered generously. He was one of the founders of the London 'Unitarian Society' (1791), but on the introduction into its preamble of the term 'idolatrous,' as applied to the worship of our Lord, he withdrew his name and cancelled his donation. From about 1808 he was confined to his rooms by gout. He died unmarried at Jesus College on 25 April 1817. He published two sermons preached before the university, and a reprint (1787) of his two papers in 'Commentaries and Essays.'

[R. P. Tyrwhitt's Notices and Remains of the Family of Tyrwhitt, 1872, p. 73; Lindsay's Historical View, 1783, pp. 492 seq.; Monthly

Repository, 1817 p. 316, 1819 p. 653, 1836 p. 474; Gradanti Cantabr. 1823, p. 483; information from the records of Jesus College, kindly furnished by the master.] A. G.

TYRWHITT, THOMAS (1730-1786), classical commentator, born on 27 March 1730, was the eldest son of Robert Tyrwhitt, D.D. (d. 15 June 1742), rector of St. James's, Westminster, and afterwards archdeacon of London and canon of Windsor, who married, on 15 Aug. 1728, Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Edmund Gibson [q. v.], bishop of London. When six years old he was sent to a school at Kensington, and from 1741 he was at Eton. He entered as a commoner at Queen's College, Oxford, on 5 May 1747, matriculating on 9 May, and graduating B.A. in 1750. In 1755 he was elected to a fellowship at Merton College, and next year he proceeded M.A. While at Oxford he wrote 'An Epistle to Florio at Oxford' [anon.], 1749 (reprinted 'Gent. Mag.' 1835, ii. 595-600). Florio was George Ellis of Jamaica, who had been with Tyrwhitt at Eton and was elected a member of the house of assembly at Jamaica in 1751. Another undergraduate work was 'Translations in Verse: Mr. Pope's "Messiah" and Mr. Phillips's "Splendid Shilling" in Latin; the "Eighth Isthmian" of Pindar in English' [anon.], 1752. The first two were rendered in 1747, the last in 1750.

In 1755 Tyrwhitt was called to the bar at the Middle Temple, but the state of his health did not permit him to practise. Lord Barrington appointed him deputy secretary at war in December 1756, but the duties of that office were not incompatible with residence for most part of the year at Oxford. He held the post until 1762, when he was made clerk of the House of Commons in succession to Jeremiah Dyson [q. v.], and moved to London, vacating his fellowship. He was credited at the time with the knowledge of 'almost every European tongue,' and was at well read in English literature as in that of Greece and Rome.

He remained clerk of the house until 1768, when he was succeeded by John Hatsell [q. v.]. A letter from him to William Bowyer, the learned printer, on the printing of the journals of the House of Commons, is in Nichols's 'Literary Anecdotes' (ii. 413-14). He published 'Proceedings and Debates of the House of Commons 1020-1, from an original manuscript at Queen's College, Oxford' [anon.], 1766, 2 vols. (these reports may have been made by Sir Edward Nicholas), and 'The Manner of holding Parliaments, by Henry Elsing,' 1768.

In the meantime Tyrwhitt's exceptional philological knowledge was brought to bear upon some important problems of criticism. In 1766 appeared anonymously his 'Observations and Conjectures upon some Passages of Shakespeare,' and many other remarks and criticisms on Shakespeare were given by him in later years to George Steevens [q. v.] for his edition of 1778, to Malone for his supplement in 1780, and to Isaac Reed for his edition of 1785. More noteworthy still was his work upon Chaucer and his exposure of Chatterton's 'Rowley' forgeries (see below). Tyrwhitt's 'Appendix' to his edition of the 'Rowley' poems is the foremost book upon the right side in that controversy; and it is not too much to say, observes Professor Skeat, that Tyrwhitt is the only writer among those that handled the subject who had a real critical knowledge of the language of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, and who, in fact, had on that account a real claim to be heard' (Chatterton's Poems, 1871, vol. ii. p. ix). On withdrawing from official life in 1768 Tyrwhitt spent the remaining years of his life almost wholly among his books. His disposition was most generous, and in one year of his life he is said to have given away 2,000l. In 1778 he gave 100l. towards the new buildings at Queen's College. He was elected F.R.S. on 28 Feb. 1771, and a trustee of the British Museum in 1784. He died after a short illness at his house in Welbeck Street, Cavendish Square, London, on 15 Aug. 1786, and was buried in the family vault in the east aisle of St. George's, Windsor, on 22 Aug. He left to the British Museum a valuable collection of classical authors in about nine hundred volumes (EDWARDS, British Museum, ii. 417), and many of the books contained his manuscript notes.

Charles Burney, D.D., ranked Tyrwhitt among the greatest critics of the last century. Glowing tributes were paid to him by Wyttenbach in his life of Ruhnken (p. 71), by Kraft in the 'Epistole Selectae' (p. 818), by Schweighäuser in his edition of Polybius (i. p. xxvi of preface), by Kidd in the 'Opuscula Ruhnkeniana' (p. viii, and in pp. lxxiii-lxxx is a list of his works), and by Bishop Copleston in the 'Reply to the Calumnies of the "Edinburgh Review"' (2nd edit. 1810). Mathias thought that his learning and sagacity were often misapplied (Pursuits of Literature, 7th edit. pp. 88 and 98).

A portrait, painted by Benjamin Wilson, was engraved by John Jones, and published on 2 Jan. 1788.

Besides the works already mentioned, Tyrwhitt edited or wrote: 1. 'Fragmenta duo Plutarchi' from Harleian MS. 5612, 1773. 2. 'Canterbury Tales of Chaucer, with an Essay upon his Language and Versification, an Introductory Discourse and Notes' [anon.], 1775, 4 vols.; 5th vol., containing a glossary, 1778 (Gent. Mag. 1788, i. 461). This edition of Tyrwhitt was reissued in 1798, and has often been reprinted. So late as 1891 his notes and glossary were condensed and arranged under the text in the edition of Chaucer in No. 32 of Sir John Lubbock's 'Hundred Books' (cf. Notes and Queries, 7th ser. vi. 86, 133, 214). In 1775 this edition was considered 'the best edited English Classic that ever has appeared,' and Professor Skeat in his edition (vol. iv. 1894) speaks of it 'as a work of high literary value, to which I am greatly indebted for many necessary notes,' but dwells on its grammatical errors and the frequent introductions of words into the text. Guest praises his sagacity, but points out his defects (English Rhythms, i. 180-1, ii. 265-6). 3. 'Dissertatio de Babrio Fabularum Æsopæarum Scriptore' [anon.], 1776. Somefables, never before edited, of Æsop, from the Bodleian Library, were added to it. An 'auctarium' of this dissertation was appended to his edition of Orpheus in 1781. Both essay and auctarium were reprinted by T. C. Harles at Erlangen in 1785, and were included in 1810 in the 'Fabulæ Æsopice' of Franciscus de Furia. 4. 'Poems supposed to have been written at Bristol by Thomas Rowley and others in the Fifteenth Century, with a preface and glossary' [anon.], 1777; 2nd edit. 1777; 3rd edit., with an appendix to prove that they were written entirely by Chatterton, 1778. Nicholas says that Tyrwhitt was at first inclined to believe in the authenticity of the poems, but that, finding good ground for changing his opinion, he cancelled several leaves (Illustr. of Literature, i. 158; JOHNSON, Letters, ed. G. B. Hill, i. 398, 404; Gent. Mag. 1788, i. 187-8; NICHOLS, Lit. Anecdotes, ix. 529-31). 5. 'Vindication of the Appendix to the Poems called Rowley's,' 1782. It was 'reckoned completely victorious' (WALPOLE, Letters, vi. 412, viii. 279; the opposite view was, however, maintained by Samuel Roffey Maitland [q. v.] as late as 1857). 6. 'De Lapidibus: Poems in Greek and Latin, attributed by some to Orpheus. Based on Gesner's edition, but Tyrwhitt "reconsuit notasque adjecit." With "auctarium de Babrio,"' 1781. His notes and preface are included in the edition of Germannus (Leipzig, 1805). Ruhnken, who had made Tyrwhitt's acquaintance at Paris, reviewed it in Wytenbach's 'Bibliotheca Critica,' ii. 85-94 (reprinted by Kidd in Ruhnken's 'Opuscula,' 1807, Tract 16), with the highest praise (cf. also Kidd's preface to Porson's Tracts, pp.

xcv-xcviii). Tyrwhitt is frequently referred to in the letters of Ruhnken to Wytenbach (ed. Kraft, 1834, pp. 24, 28, 35, 46, 159, 166-7). 7. 'Conjecturae in Strabonem, with Latin Inscription, to George Jubb, Canon of Christ Church,' dated London, 18 July 1788: reprinted, with preface by T. C. Harles, at Erlangen in 1788. 8. 'Two Dissertations by Samuel Musgrave,' 1782. These were edited by Tyrwhitt for the benefit of Musgrave's family. He had previously given the emendations on Euripides which were added by Musgraves as an appendix (pp. 133-76) to his 'Exercitationum in Euripidem libri duo' (1702), and he supplied Schweighäuser with Musgrave's notes on Appian (ed. of Schweighäuser, i. pref. pp. xix-xx). 9. 'Oration of Isæus against Menæceus,' 1785. 10. 'Aristotelis de Poetica liber, Græce et Latine,' 1794. This was edited by Bishop Burgess, with the assistance of Bishop Randolph, and was dedicated to Shute Barrington [q. v.], bishop of Durham, who inscribed some lines to Tyrwhitt on an urn in his garden at Mongewell, Oxfordshire (Gent. Mag. 1807, ii. 1147; NICHOLS, Illustr. of Lit. v. 610). There were many editions of this work. 11. 'Thomæ Tyrwhitti Conjecturae in Æschylum, Euripidem, et Aristophanem. Accedunt epistolæ diversorum ad Tyrwhittum,' 1822. Possibly edited by Peter Elmsley (1773-1825) [q. v.] (Notes and Queries, 6th ser. vi. 149-50).

In 1814 the Cambridge press promised a reprint in one volume of Tyrwhitt's 'Babrius, the Pseud-Orpheus,' and other treatises, but it never came out. A volume of his opuscula, prepared for the press after his death by Thomas Kidd, but never issued, is among the Dyce books at the South Kensington Museum, which also possesses the autograph manuscript of his 'Epistle to Florio' (ib. 2nd ser. ix. 198, 6th ser. vi. 71-2, 149-50). He and Matthew Duane [q. v.] purchased at an auction in London in June 1773 three ancient marbles from Smyrna, and gave them to the British Museum. Tyrwhitt's account of them is in the 'Archæologia' (iii. 230-5, and see ib. pp. 184, 324). His 'notes braves' on Toup's emendations of Suidas are in that scholar's edition of that work (1790, iv. 419-29); and Monk, in his edition of the Alcestis, inserts Tyrwhitt's conjectures from the copy of it at the British Museum. Burgess dedicated to him the second edition (1781) of the 'Miscellanea Critica' of Richard Dawes, and embodied in it (pp. 344-491) many of his observations. Tyrwhitt helped Brunnell in his edition of Sophocles, and William Cleaver [q. v.], bishop of St. Asaph, was indebted to him in his 1789 edition of 'De Rhythmo Græcorum' for observations on the 'cæsura metrica' and for some corrections. Letters to and from him are in Nichols's 'Illustrations of Literature' (viii. 220-1), Nichols's 'Literary Anecdotes' (viii. 118), Harford's 'Life of Bishop Burgess' (pp. 21-119), 'Epistolæ Selectæ', ed. Kraft (1881, pp. 188-9), and in MSS. 17628-39 at the Bodleian Library.

[Foster's Alumni Oxon.; Foster's Baronetage; Gent. Mag. 1785 ii. 559, 1786 ii. 717-19, 905, 994, 1787 i. 218-19; Notes and Queries, 2nd ser. ix. 198, 5th ser. xii. 144 (by Professor J. E. B. Mayor), 6th ser. vi. 71, 140, 7th ser. viii. 133; Nichols's Illustr. of Lit. v. 427, viii. 220-3; Nichols's Lit. Anecd. iii. 147-51, 234, iv. 660, viii. 525, ix. 527-9, 756-7; information from Rev. Dr. Magrath, Queen's Coll. Oxford.]
W. P. G.

TYSDALE, JOHN (fl. 1550-1563), printer. [See TISDALE.]

TYSILIO (fl. 600), British saint, was, according to the old lists of saints, the son of Brochwal Ysgythrog, prince of Powys, by his wife Garddun, daughter of King Pabo of the north (Myvyrian Archaeology, 2nd edit. p. 416; Cambro-British Saints, p. 267; Iolo MSS., pp. 104, 180). He founded the church of Maifod, Montgomeryshire, where Beuno is said to have visited him (Life of Beuno in Cambro-British Saints, p. 15). Other churches dedicated to him are Llandysilio, Montgomeryshire, Llandysilio and Bryn Eglwys, Denbighshire, Llandysilio. Anglesey, Llandysilio, Carmarthenshire, Llandysilio Gogo, Cardiganshire, Sellack and Llansilio, Herefordshire. The poet Cynddelw has an ode to Tysilio, printed in the 'Myvyrian Archaeology' (2nd edit. pp. 177-9). Professor Rhys regards the name as a compound, of which the first element is the prefix 'ty-' seen also in Tello, Tyfaelog, and Tegai (Archæologia Cambrensis, 5th ser. xii. 37). Tysilio's feast day was 8 Nov.

Tradition makes the saint both a poet and an historian. The 'Red Book of Hengest' contains thirty stanzas attributed to him, which are printed in the 'Myvyrian Archaeology' (2nd edit. pp. 123-4) and in Skene's 'Four Ancient Books of Wales' (ii. 237-41), and are certainly not of the sixth or seventh century. The statement that Tysilio wrote 'an ecclesiastical history of Britain' (PUGH, Cambrian Biography) was originally made by Ussher, on grounds which it is now impossible to test (Cambrian Register, i. 26). Nor is it clear what manuscript authority was followed by the editors of the 'Myvyrian Archaeology' in styling the first version they print (from Jesus Coll. MS. 28, not, as they state, from the Red Book of Hengest) of Geoffrey's 'Brut Tysilio' (2nd edit. p. 432). It appears, however, from a letter of Lewis Morris, printed in vol. ii. of the 'Cambrian Register' (p. 489), that a manuscript called 'Tysilio's History of Great Britain,' in the handwriting of Gutyn Owain, was in 1745 in the Llannerch collection, and though Morris had 'never heard of any history written by' the saint, he at once accepted this as the Welsh original of Geoffrey's history, a view also taken as to 'Brut Tysilio' in the 'Myvyrian Archaeology' (2nd edit. p. 432) and by Peter Roberts in his 'Chronicle of the Kings of Britain' (1811). In point of fact, the 'Brut Tysilio' version is a late compilation, of which no manuscript is known of earlier date than the fifteenth century (preface to RHYs and EVANS's Bruts, 1890, pp. xvi-xix).

[Rees's Welsh Saints, and authorities cited.]
J. E. L.

TYSON, EDWARD, M.D. (1650-1708), physician, son of Edward Tyson, was born at Clavedon, Somerset, in 1650. His family was of Cumberland originally. He was matriculated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, 10 May 1667, graduated B.A. 8 Feb. 1670, M.A. 4 Nov. 1673. He took the degree of M.D. at Cambridge, where he became a member of Benet College. He settled in London, was a candidate at the College of Physicians on 30 Sept. 1680, was elected a fellow on 2 April 1683, and a censor in 1694. He became physician to Bridewell and Bethlehem Hospitals, and lectured on anatomy to the Barber-Surgeons for some years till 1699, when he resigned. The manuscript syllabus of his lectures, with numerous little animals drawn on the margin, is preserved in the Sloane collection in the British Museum. His medical writings are all in the 'Philosophical Transactions' or in the 'Acta Medica' of Bartholinus, and are all valuable records of cases, such as an abnormal liver (No. 142), remarks on an extraordinary birth (No. 160), abscess of the brain and brain of an idiot (No. 228), hydatids in the bladder (No. 287), and four pulmonary cases. William Harvey [q. v.], Edward Browne [q. v.], and other physicians had made numerous dissections of animals, but Tyson was the first in England who published several elaborate monographs of particular animals. His 'Phocæna, or the Anatomy of a Porpoise,' published in 1680, is a fuller and more exact account of that animal than any before. He describes the skeleton and viscera, but does not say much on the muscles. In 1683 he published the 'Anatomy of the Rattlesnake,' which first appeared in the 'Philosophical Transactions' (No. 144). In the same publication he gave dissections of lumbricus latus—the tapeworm (No. 146), and lumbricus teres, now known as ascaris lumbricoides (No. 147); and of lumbricus hydropicus (No. 193) or hydatid, which he successfully shows to be an animal and not a mere morbid growth; and of the Tajacu, or Mexico musk-hog. He published the first thorough dissection of the female Virginian opossum, which he calls 'Carigueya seu Marsupiale Americanum,' in 1698; and in 1699 'Orang Outang, sive Homo Sylvestris, or the Anatomy of a Pygmy.' The ape was a chimpanzee from Africa, and not a true orang-outang. A second edition appeared in 1751. The dissection is carefully and clearly described, and is followed by an essay of much learning on the pigmies of the ancients, which, with their cynocephali, satyrs, and sphinges, he believes to have been apes. The book has excellent plates, and is dedicated to the Lord-chancellor John Somers [q. v.]. He translated in 1681 Swammerdam's admirable 'Ephemeris Vita,' and in the preface urges naturalists to study the British ephemerides. In Willughby's 'Historia Picium,' 1686, he wrote the anatomy of an embryo shark and of the lumpus Anglorum; and in Plot's 'Natural History of Oxfordshire' (p. 305) he wrote on the scent-bags of polecats. In 'Phocena' he makes some excellent suggestions for a general English natural history. His general learning was considerable, and he published in 1689 'A Philosophical Essay concerning the Rhymes of the Ancients.' He was not a 'signetur man,' but took the part of the apothecaries in the dispensary controversy; and Sir Samuel Garth [q. v.], who calls him 'Oarus,' has satirised his deliberate way of speaking and his taste for Swiss philosophy, Danish poetry, and every kind of old books, Refuse of fairs and gleanings of Duck Lane.

Tyson died on 1 Aug. 1708, and was buried in St. Dionis Backchurch, and since the demolition in recent years of that church his monument has been moved to All Hallows, Lombard Street. Elkanah Settle published a funeral poem, 'Threnodium Apollinare,' in his memory, of ten pages of heroic verse. The Barber-Surgeons had his portrait painted, and it hung in their parlour (Younge, Annals of the Barber-Surgeons) till 1746, when they sold it for ten guineas to his relative, Luke Maurics. It is probably the portrait now in the College of Physicians, given in 1764 by his great-nephew, Dr. Richard Tyson (1730-1784) [q. v.]

[Works; Munk's Coll. of Phys. i. 423; Foster's Alumni Oxon.] N. M.

TYSON, MICHAEL (1740-1780), antiquary and artist, born in the parish of Stamford All Saints on 19 Nov. 1740, was the only child of Michael Tyson (d. 22 Feb. 1794, aged 88), dean of Stamford and archdeacon of Huntingdon, by his first wife, Miss Curtis of Woollethorpe, Lincolnshire. He was entered at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, in 1759, became a scholar of the college, and studied Greek under the Rev. John Cowper, brother of William Cowper, the poet. He graduated B.A. in 1764, M.A. in 1767, and B.D. in 1775, and in 1767 was elected to a fellowship at his college.

In the autumn of 1766 Tyson accompanied Richard Gough [q. v.] in a tour, of which he kept an exact journal, through the north of England and Scotland; during the journey he was made a burgher of Glasgow (12 Sept. 1766) and of Inverary (17 Sept.). He returned to residence at college, and devoted himself to etching and botany. Gough, however, in some verses on his friend, calls him 'idlest of men on old Camus banks.' With Israel Lyone the younger he made frequent peregrinations in search of rare plants around Cambridge, and often consulted Gray on botanical points. The account of Gray's knowledge of natural history in Mason's life of the poet (p. 402) was by him. He was elected F.S.A. on 2 June 1768, and F.R.S. on 11 Feb. 1779. On 17 March 1769 he made himself conspicuous at Cambridge as a zealous whig by voting with John Jebb in a minority of two against the tory address to George III (COOPER, Annals of Cambridge, iv. 354).

Tyson was ordained deacon by Bishop Green at Whitehall chapel on 11 March 1770, and until 1772 was minister of Sawston, Cambridgeshire. For a time he was dean of his college, and he was bursar about 1774 when he succeeded to the cure of St. Benedict's Church in Cambridge. In 1776 Tyson became Whitehall preacher. In the same year he and the Rev. Thomas Kerich made a catalogue of the prints in the university library at Cambridge.

In March 1778 Tyson was inducted, after a long legal dispute as to the right of patronage which was exercised by Corpus Christi College, to the rectory of Lambourne near Ongar in Essex, and on 4 July he was married at St. Benedict's Church, Cambridge, to Margaret, daughter of Hitch Wale of Shalford in Cambridgeshire. Tyson died at Lambourne on 4 May 1780 from a violent fever, which carried him off within a week, and was buried on 10 May outside the communion rails, but there is no memorial of him in the church. He left one son, Michael Curtis Tyson (1779-1794), who inherited his 'grandmother's jointure,' the manors of Barholme and Stow-cum-Deeping in Lincolnshire. His widow married, as her second husband, in the autumn of 1784, Mr. J. Crouch, assistant clerk of the minutes of the custom-house (Gent. Mag. 1784, ii. 796). Tyson knew Italian, French, and Spanish; and his library, which was sold by Leigh & Sotheby in 1781, was rich in rare works in those languages.

Tyson executed many engravings, etchings, and miniatures for private circulation, though some of them were 'exposed to public sale.' He made etchings of many Cambridgeshire churches and tombs, and of the portraits of the masters of his college. That of Jacob Butler, proprietor of the Barnwell estate, is in the 'Bibliotheca Topographica Britannica,' vol. v., and his drawing of Browne Willis is in Nichols's 'Literary Anecdotes' (viii. 219). He etched and dedicated to Cole a portrait of Michael Dalton [q. v.], and he made the etching of the Rev. Henry Etough, under which Gray wrote the bitter epigram beginning

Thus Tophet look'd, so grinned the brawling fiend.

Several of his drawings are in the 'Antiquarian Repertory.'

An account by Tyson 'of a singular fish brought by Commodore Byrou from the South Seas,' appeared in the 'Philosophical Transactions,' 1771, pp. 247-9, and he wrote English verses in the university collections on the accession of George III. (1760), his marriage (1761), the birth of the Prince of Wales (1762), and on the peace (1763). He long contemplated a work on Queen Elizabeth's progresses, but the undertaking was in the end carried out by John Nichols, who received much information from him (NICHOLS, Progresses of Elizabeth, preface, pp. v, xlv). A description of an illuminated manuscript at Corpus Christi College, with plates by him, was printed as his paper in 'Archæologia' (ii. 194-7), and reprinted at Cambridge in 1770 as his work; but the authorship has been claimed by the Rev. William Cole.

Tyson was very friendly with James Essex, Rev. William Cole, Horace Walpole, Richard Gough, and Mason the poet. Letters to and from him are in Nichols's 'Illustrations of Literature' (iv. 91-2, 728-9, v. 340-2; of Literary Anecdotes, viii. 587-872, ix. 718-719; GRANGER, Letters, 1806, pp. 152-5; and Gent. Mag. 1777, p. 416). Gough paid affectionate tributes to his memory in 'Sepulchral Monuments' (i. preface), and in his edition of Camden's 'Britannia' (sub 'Lambourne'). In the first of these works he was indebted to Tyson for several drawings.

[Cole's Addit. MS. 5886 at British Museum, printed in Brydges's Restituta, iv. 236-9, and in Nichols's Lit. Anecd. viii. 204-10; Gent. Mag. 1780 p. 252, 1818 i. 8, ii. 206, 1814 i. 427; Wale's Grandfather's Pocket Book, p. 210; Masters's Corpus Christi Coll., ed. Lamb, pp. 407-9, 415, 491; Thorne's Environs, ii. 411; Walpole's Letters, v. 102, 179, 181, 209, 287, 338, 455, vii. 280, 363; Nichols's Lit. Anecdotes, i. 671-694, iii. 646, vi. 208, 624, viii. 645, 677-8; Nichols's Illustr. of Lit. ii. 60, iii. 780, iv. 714-715, vi. 288, 812; Wright's Essex, ii. 405; information from Rev. C. A. Goodhart of Lambourne.] W. P. C.

TYSON, RICHARD (1080-1750), physician, son of Edward Tyson [q. v.], was born in 1680 in Gloucestershire. He entered Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, and obtained a fellowship. He graduated M.B. 1710, and M.D. 1715. He was elected a fellow of the College of Physicians on 25 June 1718, was five times censor between 1718 and 1737, was registrar from 1723 to 1735, treasurer 1739-40, and president 1740-50. He delivered the Harveian oration in 1725. On 27 May 1725 he was elected physician to St. Bartholomew's Hospital. He died on 8 Jan. 1749-50.

[Munk's Coll. of Phys. ii. 69; manuscript Journal of St. Bartholomew's Hospital.] N. M.

TYSON, RICHARD (1730-1784), physician, son of Richard Tyson, physician, and great-nephew of Edward Tyson [q. v.], was born in 1730 in the parish of St. Dionis Backchurch in the city of London. He matriculated at Oriel College, Oxford, 6 April 1747, and thence graduated B.A. 13 Oct. 1750, M.A. 5 July 1753, M.B. 30 April 1756, and M.D. 15 Jan. 1760. He was elected a fellow of the College of Physicians of London, 30 Sept. 1761, was censor in 1763, 1768, 1773, and 1776, and registrar from 1774 to 1780. He was elected physician to St. Bartholomew's Hospital on 5 Feb. 1762. He died on 9 Aug. 1784. His portrait is in the College of Physicians.

[Munk's Coll. of Phys. ii. 234; manuscript Journal of St. Bartholomew's Hospital.] N. M.

TYTLER, ALEXANDER FRASER, LORD WOODHOUSELEE (1747-1813), eldest son of William Tytler [q. v.] of Woodhouselee, by Ann, daughter of James Craig of Cossart, was born at Edinburgh, 15 Oct. 1747. After attending the high school of Edinburgh, where he became dux of the rector's class, he was sent in 1763 to an academy at Kensington, where he remained two years. Thence in 1765 he entered the university of Edinburgh, and on 28 Jan. 1770 he was called to the Scottish bar. Soon afterwards he began to indicate a literary bent, in which, however, he did not display talent of a more than respectable order. In 1771 he published at Edinburgh 'Pisoatory Eclogues, with other Poetical Miscellanies of Phineas Fletcher, illustrated with notes, critical and explanatory.' In 1778 he published a supplementary volume to Lord Kames's 'Dictionary of Decisions,' entitled 'The Decisions of the Court of Session, from its first institution to the present time, abridged and digested under proper heads in form of a dictionary.' In 1780 he was appointed joint professor with John Pringle of universal history in the university of Edinburgh, and in 1786 he became sole professor. 'It was,' says Lord Cockburn, 'as professor of history that he was chiefly distinguished. His lectures were not marked either by originality of matter or by spirit, but though cold and general they were elegant and judicious.' For the use of his class he printed in 1783 'Plan and Outline of a Course of Lectures on Universal History, Ancient and Modern, delivered in the University of Edinburgh, Edinburgh, 1783; and the substance of these lectures was published by him in 1801 in two volumes, under the title 'Elements of General History, Ancient and Modern; to which is added a Table of Chronology, and a Companion of Ancient and Modern Geography.' He was a contributor to the 'Mirror,' 1779-80 (Nos. 17, 37, 59, 79), and to the 'Lounger,' 1785-6 (Nos. 7, 19, 24, 44, 63, 70, 79). In 1787 he compiled a 'History of the Royal Society of Edinburgh,' forming part of vol. i. of the 'Transactions' of that society; and to vol. ii. of the 'Transactions' he contributed a life of Lord-president Dundas. In the same volume he also gave 'An Account of some extraordinary Structures on the Tops of Hills in the Highlands, with Remarks on the Progress of the Arts among the Ancient Inhabitants of Scotland; and to vol. v. (1805) he contributed 'Remarks on a Mixed Species of Evidence in Matters of History.' To the edition of the works of Dr. John Gregory [q. v.] published in 1788, he contributed a life of Gregory.

In 1780 Tytler was appointed judge-advocate of Scotland, and in 1792 he succeeded his father in the estate of Woodhouselee. In 1791 he published an 'Essay on the Principles of Translation,' of which a third edition appeared in 1818; in 1798 'A Critical Examination of Mr. Whitaker's Course of Hannibal over the Alps;' the same year a new edition of 'Dr. Derham's Physico-Theology,' with an 'Account of the Life and Writings of the Author,' and a short 'Dissertation on Final Causes,' in 1799; 'Ireland profiting by Example, or the Question considered whether Scotland has gained or lost by the Union;' in 1800 an 'Essay on Military Law and the Practice of Courts Martial;' and the same year 'Remarks on the Writings and Genius of Ramsay,' prefixed to a collected edition of Allan Ramsay's 'Works.' Tytler assisted, or promised to assist, Burns in seeing the 1798 or 1794 edition of Burns's 'Poems' through the press, but how far he is responsible for certain changes of phraseology in the 1794 edition it is impossible to state. Several of Tytler's manuscripts are in the Laing collection in the university of Edinburgh.

In 1802 Tytler was raised to the bench of the court of session, with the title of Lord Woodhouselee, taking his seat on 2 Feb., and on 12 March 1811 he was constituted a lord of justiciary. After his elevation to the bench he did not altogether neglect his literary recreations, publishing in 1807 'Memoirs of the Life and Writings of the Hon. Henry Home, Lord Kames,' and in 1810 'An Historical and Critical Essay on the Life and Character of Petrarch, with a translation of a few of his sonnets.' He died at Edinburgh, 5 Jan. 1813, in his sixty-eighth year. His portrait by Raeburn belongs to the family.

By his wife Ann, eldest daughter of William Fraser of Balnain, Inverness-shire, in whose right he became possessed of that estate, he had, with two daughters, four sons, of whom the third, Alexander, was author of 'Considerations on the Present Political State of India,' 1816, and the youngest was Patrick Fraser Tytler [q. v.], the historian. Another son, James, was father of James Stuart Fraser Tytler (1820-1891), writer to the signet, and from 1866 till his death professor of conveyancing in the university of Edinburgh. The elder daughter, Ann Fraser Tytler, wrote several books for children, including the well-known 'Leila on the Island' (1839), which, with its continuations, 'Leila in England' and 'Leila at Home,' has passed through numerous editions both in England and in America. The younger daughter, Jane, married James Baillie Fraser [q. v.]

'Tytler,' says Lord Cockburn, 'was unquestionably a person of correct taste, a cultivated mind and literary habits, and very amiable, which excellently graced, and were graced by, the mountain retreat whose name he transferred to the bench. But there is no kindness in insinuating that he was a man of genius, and of public or even social influence, or in describing Woodhouse as Tusculum.'

[The Life of Tytler, by the Rev. Archibald Alison, published in the Transactions of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, Lord Cockburn describes as 'a dream of recollections, in which realities are softened by the illusions of the author's own tenderness.' See further Lord Cockburn's Memorials of his own Time; Kay's Edinburgh Portraits, Bower's Hist. of the University of Edinburgh; Bruntton and Haig's Senators of the College of Justice; Encyclopædia Britannica, 8th edit.] T. F. H.

TYTLER, HENRY WILLIAM (1752-1808), physician and translator, born at Fearn, Forfarshire, in 1752, was the younger brother of James Tytler [q. v.], and the son of George Tytler (d. 1785), minister of Fearn, by his wife, Janet Robertson. In 1793 he published the 'Works of Callimachus translated into English Verse; the Hymns and Epigrams from the Greek, with the Coma Berenices from the Latin of Catullus,' which is said to be the first translation of a Greek poet by a native of Scotland. They were reprinted in 'Bohn's Classical Library' (1856). In 1797, Tytler, who had graduated M.D., published 'Pædophilia, or the Art of Nursing and Rearing Children: a Poem in three books,' translated from the Latin of Scévole de Sainte-Marthe, with medical and historical notes. He published in 1804 a 'Voyage from the Cape of Good Hope.' He also completed a translation of the seventeen books of the 'Poem of Silius Italicus on the Punic War,' which was not published. Tytler died at Edinburgh on 22 July 1808.

[Anderson's Scottish Nation; British Critic, xi. 70; Gent. Mag. 1808, ii. 852; Scott's Fasti Eccl. Scotiæ, iii. ii. 331.] E. I. O.

TYTLER, JAMES (1747?-1805), miscellaneous writer, commonly known as 'Balloon Tytler,' born about 1747, was son of George Tytler, minister of Fearn in the presbytery of Brechin, by his wife, Janet Robertson. Henry William Tytler [q. v.] was his younger brother. After receiving a good education under the direction of his father, James became apprentice to a surgeon in Forfar. He then succeeded in attending medical classes at the university of Edinburgh, defraying his expenses by voyages as a surgeon to Greenland during the vacations. But, having married during his medical course, he resolved to commence practice as a surgeon in Edinburgh. Failing in this, he opened an apothecary's shop in Leith, trusting mainly to the custom of the religious sect the Glassites, which he had joined through the persuasion of his wife; she was a daughter of James Young, writer to the signet, a prominent member of the sect. A quarrel with his wife, who deserted him, and his severance from the sect, had, however, such a ruinous effect on his business that an accumulation of debts compelled him to remove, first to Berwick, and then to Newcastle. At Newcastle he opened a laboratory, but here also fortune failed to shine on him, and, driven by debt from England, he in 1772 resolved to venture back to Edinburgh, where he took refuge from his creditors within the privileged precincts of Holyrood House.

From this time properly begins the peculiar career of Tytler as literary hack and scientific dabbler, in which he showed abilities that under favourable auspices might have brought him fame and fortune, but as a matter of fact never did more than barely save him from destitution; so that he was described by Burns as 'a mortal who drudges about Edinburgh as a common printer, with leaky shoes, a sky-lighted hat, and knee-breeches as unlike as George-by-the-grace-of-God and Solomon-the-son-of-David.' While in the debtors' refuge at Holyrood he succeeded, by means of a press of his own construction, in printing in 1772 a volume of 'Essays on the most important subjects of Natural and Revealed Religion.' It was followed by 'A Letter to Mr. John Barclay on the Doctrine of Assurance,' directed against a religious sect called the Bereans. Next appeared the 'Gentleman's and Lady's Magazine,' published monthly, but soon discontinued. He also commenced an abridgment of 'Universal History,' of which, however, only one volume appeared. These efforts having attracted the attention of the booksellers, he soon obtained a variety of literary work at the current hack pay. In 1776 he was engaged to edit the second edition of 'Encyclopædia Britannica,' at the astounding salary of seventeen shillings a week, and at this rate of pay he not only edited it, but wrote about three-fourths of the whole work. He was also engaged (according to Stenhouse, on more liberal terms) 'to conduct the third edition of that work, and wrote a larger share in the earlier volumes than is ascribed to him in the general preface.'

In 1780 Tytler commenced a periodical, 'The Weekly Mirror,' but it was soon discontinued. Some time afterwards he was employed in constructing a manufactory of magnesia, but, after having placed it in full working order, he was dismissed by the pro-prieters. His scientific bent then took the turn of constructing a fire balloon (after the pattern of the Parisian Montgolfières of 1783), with which on 27 Aug. 1784 he made an ascent at Comely Gardens, Edinburgh, to a height of 350 feet (see Gent. Mag. 1784, ii. 709, 711). Attributing his want of perfect success to the smallness of the stove, he constructed another with an enlarged stove, in which he endeavoured to ascend one morning unwitnessed by any one. It began to ascend with great force, but coming in contact with a tree the stove was broken, and Tytler found himself unable to prosecute the experiment further. He was 'the first person in Great Britain to navigate the air,' and, with the exception of Smeath in 1837, the only aeronaut to use a Montgolfière in this country (cf. TURNOR, Astra Castra, p. 56; and art. LUNARDI, VINCENZO).

In 1786 he published 'The Observer,' a weekly paper, extending to twenty-six numbers and comprising a series of essays; and in 1788 he published a system of geography. Other works by him are 'The Hermit, imitated from Virgil's "Silenus"' (Edinburgh, 1782); a 'History of Edinburgh'; 'The Edinburgh Geographical, Historical, and Commercial Grammar'; and 'A Dissertation on the Origin and Antiquity of the Scottish Nation' (London, 1795, 8vo). His abilities as a writer of verse are shown in various songs signed 'T.' contributed to Johnson's 'Musical Museum,' including 'The Bonnie Bruckel Lassie,' with the exception of the first two lines; 'As I came by Loch Erochside'; 'As I went over yon meadow'; and 'One night I dreamed.'

In 1792 Tytler joined the 'Society of the Friends of the People,' and shortly afterwards he published 'A Pamphlet on the Excise,' exposing the abuses of the government. The same year he started 'The Historical Register, or Edinburgh Monthly Intelligencer,' in which he set forth advanced views in regard to reform; and, having at the close of the year published 'A Handbill addressed to the People,' a warrant was issued for his apprehension. Learning the intentions of the authorities, he suddenly left Edinburgh, and, crossing over to Ireland, sailed thence to America. Failing to appear at the high court of justiciary, Edinburgh, he was outlawed on 7 Jan. 1793. Shortly after his arrival in America he proceeded to Salem, Mass., where he conducted a newspaper until his death in 1805 in his fifty-eighth year.

[A Biographical Sketch of the Life of James Tytler, Edinburgh, 1805 (with engraved portrait), is attributed to Robert Meek. See also Kay's Edinburgh Portraits; Laing's edition of Stanhouse's Notes to Johnson's Musical Museum, 1853; Anderson's Scottish Nation.]

T. F. H.

TYTLER, PATRICK FRASER (1791-1849), Scottish historian, born in 1791, was youngest son of Alexander Fraser Tytler, lord Woodhouselee [q. v.], and of his wife, Ann Fraser, eldest daughter and heiress of William Fraser of Balnain in Inverness-shire. He was educated at the high school of Edinburgh, and at home under tutors. In 1808, when seventeen, he was sent to a school at Chobham, kept by Charles Vernon, curate to Richard Cecil [q. v.] Returning home in the autumn of 1809, he attended lectures on classics and law at the university of Edinburgh, but early showed a predilection for history.

As a young man he read widely, and early commenced authorship by writing an 'Essay on the History of the Moors during their Government in Spain,' of which he had made a sketch before he went to England. He also composed a masque, on the model of 'Comus,' which was acted in 1812 at Woodhouselee by members of his family. His father died on 4 June 1813, and on 3 July of the same year Tytler was called at the age of twenty-one to the Scottish bar. In the summer of 1814 he visited Paris with his friends William Pulteney Alison [q. v.], the physician, and Archibald (afterwards Sir Archibald) Alison [q. v.], the historian. He was appointed in 1816 king's counsel in exchequer, an office worth about 150*l.* a year. After his father's death he lived with his mother during vacation at a villa on the Esk, where he frequently saw Walter Scott, who had then a cottage at Lasswade. He continued to practise at the bar till 1832, but never obtained much business, and devoted most of his time to general reading. In the summer of 1818 he made a short tour to Norway with David Anderson of St. Germain, and was at Trondhjem when the king Bernadotte and Prince Oscar of Sweden made their entry.

He began to write occasionally for 'Blackwood's Magazine,' and in 1819 he published his first work, 'The Life of the Admirable Crichton of Olney, with an Appendix of Original Papers' (Edinburgh, 8vo; 2nd edit. 1823, 12mo). He showed in this, as in all his historical work, an instinctive desire to go to the original sources, a desire less common then than now. In 1822 he took part, with Walter Scott, in forming the Bannatyne Club. Tytler became its poet-laureate, and his verses under the name of 'Garlands' were composed for the anniversaries of the club, at which they were sung, and were afterwards published; they have little poetical value. He wrote similar verses for the Midlothian yeomanry, in which he and several of his legal friends were active members of the Edinburgh troop. The only publication of the club in which he took part was 'The Memoire of the War in Scotland and Ireland, 1689-91,' by Major-general Hugh Mackay, which he edited in 1833 with Hogg of Newliston and Adam Urquhart.

It was while Tytler was a guest at Abbotsford towards the close of 1823 that Scott suggested to him that he should write a history of Scotland. But it was not till the completion of his 'Life of Wicliff' in 1826 that he definitely accepted the suggestion, to which he devoted the greater part of the following eighteen years. The first volume of his 'History,' which opened with the reign of Alexander III., was published in 1828, and the last, which carried the narrative down to the union of the crowns of England and Scotland in 1603 under James VI., appeared in 1848. Scott reviewed the first volume in the 'Quarterly' for November 1829, and expressed regret that Tytler had not begun the work at an earlier period. The limitation of period, however, gave Tytler more leisure to examine original records, then a laborious undertaking, as few were printed or catalogued. The work when concluded was generally favourably received, but was severely reviewed by Patrick Fraser (afterwards Lord Fraser) [q. v.] in the 'North British Review,' in an article republished in 1848 under the title 'Tytler's History of Scotland examined.' Fraser objected to Tytler's 'History' that it was written from an aristocratic, tory, and episcopalian point of view, and neglected to trace the progress of the Scottish people. But it may be said for Tytler that his narrative and illustrations, always plain though somewhat diffuse, will still be consulted by any one who seriously studies Scottish history, and, with all its faults, of which the chief is an occasional tendency to unequal generalisation, contains the most definite and full narrative for the period between the thirteenth and seventeenth centuries. A third edition, in seven volumes, appeared in 1846 (Edinburgh, 8vo), and an eighth in four volumes in 1864 (Edinburgh, 8vo); the latest edition was published in London, in four volumes, between 1873 and 1877.

In 1830 Tytler paid a visit to London for the purpose of consulting the documents relating to Scotland in the British Museum and state paper or record office. The subsequent adoption of a plan for publishing state papers was largely due to the zeal and advocacy of Tytler, and to a somewhat heated controversy he had with the authorities, who denied him full and ready access to the English manuscripts on the absurd ground that he was engaged on Scottish history. In December 1830 he lost his office as counsel for the exchequer by the change of ministry, and, the necessity of attending the court having ceased, he devoted himself entirely to historical work. While continuing the 'History of Scotland,' he brought out several minor works which contributed to his somewhat slender income. His 'Life of Sir Walter Raleigh' (1833) and an historical 'View of the Progress of Discovery on the more Northern Coasts of America' (1832; new ed. New York, 1846) were published in Oliver and Boyd's 'Cabinet Library,' and he undertook a series of 'Lives of Scottish Worthies' for Murray's 'Family Library,' which were published in three volumes (1831-3). He resolutely declined magazine and review writing as diverting him from more permanent work. His wife's failing health made it necessary to seek a warmer climate, and in the autumn of 1832 he left Edinburgh for Torquay, where he stayed till April, and, after a visit of a few months in London, returned to Edinburgh in September 1833. Tytler narrowly missed the appointment of keeper of the records in the Chapter House, Westminster, which was given to Sir Francis Palgrave in 1834, as well as that of historiographer royal for Scotland, to which he had a better claim, two years later, but a whig, George Brodie [q. v.], was preferred. A more serious trial was the death of his wife at Rothesay on 15 April 1835. In June he went to London and lived at Hampstead with his mother and sisters, continuing his researches at the state paper office. Congenial tastes and studies led to an intimacy which became a close friendship with a young student of records, the Rev. John (afterwards Dean) Burgon, who wrote his life with the aid of his sister, Anne Tytler. On 16 May 1836 he gave evidence before the record commission, to which he pointed out the necessity of publishing lists or calendars of state papers instead of the documents at full length, the method adopted by the old record commissioners at great cost and delay. His suggestion, no doubt made also by others, was carried out afterwards in the 'Catalogue of Materials for English History' edited by Sir Thomas Duffus Hardy [q. v.], and in the calendars of the series of the master of the rolls and the lord clerk register of Scotland. In 1836 he took part with (Sir) John Miller and Joseph Stevenson [q. v.] in the foundation of the English Historical Society, from which he hoped much; but his expectations were not fully realised, and the society was dissolved twenty years after. In 1837 Tytler finally settled in London, thenceforth only visiting Scotland in the summer.

In 1839 he published 'England under the reign of Edward VI and Mary' (London, 8vo), which included a series of original letters illustrating the contemporary history of Europe. The original matter first published in it rendered it a work of value. In the same year (1839) Tytler wrote the article 'Scotland' for the seventh edition of the 'Encyclopædia Britannica.' This article was afterwards enlarged and separately published. It reached a tenth edition in 1883 (Edinburgh, 8vo).

In the autumn of 1843, when the last volume of his 'History of Scotland' was published, he was invited by the queen to Windsor to assist Prince Albert in arranging the royal historical miniatures. He wrote for the queen a paper on the Darnley jewel, of which a few copies were printed. Next year he was granted a pension of 200*l.* by Sir Robert Peel for his literary services. He died at Malvern on 24 Dec. 1849, and was buried in the family vault, Greyfriars churchyard, Edinburgh. He was twice married: first, on 30 March 1826, to Rachel Hog of Newliston; and, secondly, on 11 Aug. 1846, to Anastasia, daughter of Thomson Bonar of Camden Place, Kent, long an intimate friend of his sisters. He left three children by his first wife: one daughter, Mary, and two sons—Alexander and Thomas Patrick—who both entered the Madras native infantry.

Besides the works already mentioned, Tytler was the author of: 1. 'Life of Sir Thomas Craig,' Edinburgh, 1823, 12mo (reprinted from 'Blackwood's Magazine'). 2. 'Historical and Critical Introduction to an Inquiry into Revival of Greek Literature in Italy.' 3. 'Life of King Henry VIII,' Edinburgh, 1837. 4. 'Letters between the Home Office, State Paper Office,' &c., London, 1830. 5. 'On the Portraits of Queen Mary of Scots.'

[Biographical Sketch prefixed to fourth volume of edition of History, 1864; Memoir of Patrick Fraser Tytler, by his friend, the Rev. John W. Burgon, Fellow of Oriel, 1859; and his sister Miss Anne Tytler's Reminiscences, which are largely used by Burgon.] Æ M.

TYTLER, WILLIAM (1711–1792), Scottish historian, son of Alexander Tytler, writer in Edinburgh, and Jane, daughter of W. Leslie of Aberdeen, was born on 12 Oct. 1711. He was educated at the high school and university of Edinburgh, and became in 1744 a writer to the signet, the principal corporation of solicitors in Scotland. He was successful in his profession, and acquired the picturesque estate of Woodhouselee on the south of the Pentlands, still possessed by his descendants. Tytler was deeply interested in archaeology and history. He joined the Select Society founded by Allan Ramsay (1713–1784) [q. v.], the painter, in 1754, and took part in its debates. Many distinguished men of letters were members of the society, and Tytler formed a close intimacy with them. He for the first time distinguished himself as an author by contributing papers to the 'Lounger,' among others one on the 'Defects of Modern Female Education in teaching the Duties of a Wife' (No. 16). His first independent work, published in 1759, was 'The Inquiry, Historical and Critical, into the Evidence against Mary Queen of Scots, and an Examination of the Histories of Dr. Robertson and David Hume with respect to that Evidence.' Though he had been preceded in 1754 by Walter Goodall (1708?–1768) [q. v.], his work continued, till the publication in 1809 of John Hosack's 'Mary Queen of Scots and her Accusers,' the most widely read of the literary productions of Mary's apologists. Tytler's work, which went through four editions, was translated into French in 1772, and again in 1860, and it was reviewed by Dr. Johnson and Smollett. He wrote a supplement on 'the Bothwell marriage,' published in the 'Transactions of the Antiquarian Society of Scotland' in 1792. In 1783 he published 'The Poetical Remains of James I, King of Scotland,' and was the discoverer in a manuscript in the Bodleian Library at Oxford of the 'Kingis Quair,' the authorship of which he ascribed on grounds generally accepted to that king. A recent attempt to contest this by Mr. J. T. T. Brown, Glasgow, 1896, though ingenious, is not, it is thought, successful. 'Christ's Kirk on the Green,' a comic ballad in a very different style, which Tytler also attributed to James, is now admitted to be of a later date.

Tytler also wrote 'Observations on the Vision,' a poem first published in Ramsay's 'Evergreen,' in which he defended Ramsay's title to its authorship; and 'An Account of the Fashionable Amusements and Entertainments of Edinburgh in the Last Century, with the Plan of a grand Concert of Music on St. Cecilia's Day, 1695.' He was an accomplished player on the harpsichord and on the flute, and was an original member of the Musical Society of Edinburgh. His prescription for a happy old age has been often quoted: 'short but cheerful meals, music, and a good conscience.' He died at Woodhouselee on 12 Sept. 1792. His portrait, by Raeburn, now at Woodhouselee, and well known in a mezzotint reproduction, is one of the best by that master. By his marriage to Ann, daughter of James Craig of Costerton, he had eight children, four of whom predeceased him. The survivors were Alexander Fraser Tytler, lord Woodhouselee [q. v.], Colonel Patrick Tytler, and a daughter.

[Memoir by his friend, Henry Mackenzie, the Man of Feeling, in the Transactions of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, 1796; Memoir in the Bee; Buxton's Life of Patrick Fraser Tytler, the historian of Scotland, his grandson, 1869.]

Æ. M.

INDEX

TO

THE NINETEENTH VOLUME.

	PAGE		PAGE
Stow, David (1798-1964) . . . . .	1	Stratford, John de (d. 1348) . . . . .	80
Stow, James (fl. 1790-1920) . . . . .	2	Stratford, Nicholas (1683-1707) . . . . .	82
Stow, John (1625?-1805) . . . . .	3	Stratford, Ralph de (d. 1354) . . . . .	84
Stowe, William Henry (1825-1935) . . . . .	6	Stratford, Robert de (d. 1362) . . . . .	84
Stowell, John (d. 1799) . . . . .	6	Stratford, William Samuel (1796-1853) . . . . .	85
Stowell, Lord. See Scott, Sir William (1715-1886).		Stratford de Redcliffe, first Viscount. See Canning, Stratford (1786-1886).
Stowell, Hugh (1790-1905) . . . . .	7	Strathallan, Viscounts of. See Drummond, William, first Viscount, 1617?-1698; Drummond, William, fourth Viscount, 1890-1740.
Stowell, Sir John (1699-1003). See Stawell.		Strathearn, Duke of. See Henry Frederick, Duke of Cumberland and Strathearn (1746-1790).
Stowell, William Hendry (1800-1858) . . . . .	7	Strathearn, Malise, sixth Earl of (fl. 1281-1315) . . . . .	85
Stowford or Stonford, John (1290?-1372?) . . . . .	8	Strathearn, Malise, seventh Earl of (fl. 1320-1345) See under Strathearn, Malise, sixth Earl.
Strachan, Archibald (d. 1652) . . . . .	8	Strathmore, first Earl of. See Lyon, Patrick (1642-1695).
Strachan, Sir John (d. 1777) . . . . .	9	Strathmore, Countess of. See Bowes, Mary Eleanor (1749-1800).
Strachan, John (1778-1807) . . . . .	10	Strathnairn, Baron. See Rose, Hugh Henry (1801-1885).
Strachan, Sir Richard John (1780-1828) . . . . .	10	Stratton, Adam de (fl. 1295-1299) . . . . .	87
Strachey, William (fl. 1009-1618) . . . . .	12	Stratton, John Proudfoot (1890-1895) . . . . .	88
Stradling, Sir Edward (1520-1600) . . . . .	13	Straubenzee, Sir Charles van (1812-1892). See Von Straubenzee.
Stradling, Sir Edward (1601-1644). See under Stradling, Sir John.		Strauss, Gustave Louis Maurice (1807?-1887) . . . . .	89
Stradling, George (1621-1698). See under Stradling, Sir John.		Street, William (1600?-1608) . . . . .	40
Stradling, Sir Henry (fl. 1642) . . . . .	14	Streeter or Streeter, John (fl. 1650-1670) . . . . .	40
Stradling, Sir John (1509-1087) . . . . .	15	Streeter, Robert (1624-1680) . . . . .	41
Stradling, Sir Thomas (1498?-1571) . . . . .	16	Strentfield, Thomas (1777-1848) . . . . .	41
Stratford, Earls of. See Wentworth, Thomas, first Earl, 1509-1641; Wentworth, Thomas, third Earl, 1072-1739; Byng, Sir John, 1772-1800.		Street, George Edmund (1824-1881) . . . . .	42
Strahan, George (1744-1824). See under Strahan, William.		Street, Sir Thomas (1626-1696) . . . . .	45
Strahan, William (1715-1785) . . . . .	17	Stroeter, John (fl. 1650-1670). See Streeter.
Strang, John (1584-1054) . . . . .	18	Stretes, Stretes, or Streate, Guillim or William (fl. 1546-1556) . . . . .	48
Strang, John (1796-1868) . . . . .	20	Stretton, Robert de (d. 1385) . . . . .	47
Strange. See also L'Estrange.		Strickland, Agnes (1796-1874) . . . . .	49
Strange, Alexander (1818-1876) . . . . .	20	Strickland, Hugh Edwin (1811-1858) . . . . .	50
Strange, Sir John (1696-1754) . . . . .	21	Strickland, Jane Margaret (1800-1888). See under Strickland, Agnes.
Strange, John (1782-1799) . . . . .	22	Strickland, Sir Roger (1640-1717) . . . . .	52
Strange, Richard (1611-1682) . . . . .	24	Strickland, Samuel (1800-1867). See under Strickland, Agnes.
Strange, Sir Robert (1721-1762) . . . . .	24	Strickland, Thomas John Francis, known as Abbé Strickland (1679?-1740) . . . . .	53
Strange, Roger le ((d. 1811) . . . . .	27	Strickland, Walter (fl. 1640-1660) . . . . .	54
Strange, Sir Thomas Andrew Lumisden (1756-1841) . . . . .	27	Strickland, William (d. 1419) . . . . .	56
Strange, Thomas Lumisden (1803-1884) . . . . .	28	Strickland, Sir William (1596?-1678). See under Strickland, Walter.
Strangeways, Sir James (d. 1516) . . . . .	29
Stratford, Viscounts. See Smythe, Percy Clinton Sydney, sixth Viscount, 1780-1855; Smythe, George Augustus Frederick Percy Sydney, seventh Viscount, 1818-1857; Smythe, Percy Ellen Frederick William, eighth Viscount, 1826-1860.
Stratford vers Lochmure, Edmund, D.D. (d. 1040?) . . . . .	29
Stratford, Edward, second Earl of Aldborough (d. 1801) . . . . .	30

	PAGE		PAGE
Strigul or Striguil, Earl of. See Clare, Richard de (d. 1176).		Stuart, John Ferdinand Smyth (1745-1814).	102
Strode, Sir George (1588-1606).	56	Stuart, John McDouall (1813-1866).	103
Strode, Ralph (fl. 1350-1400).	57	Stuart, John Sobieski Stolberg (1795?-1872), and Stuart, Charles Edward (1799?-1880).	104
Strode, Thomas (fl. 1642-1688).	59	Stuart, Ludovick, second Duke of Lennox and Duke of Richmond (1571-1634).	107
Strode, William (1590?-1645).	59	Stuart (Stewart), Mary (1642-1687). See Mary.
Strode, William (1603-1645).	61	Stuart, Peter (fl. 1788-1805). See under Stuart, Daniel.
Strong, William (d. 1664).	62	Stuart, Robert, Seigneur of Aubigny (1470?-1548). See under Stuart, Sir John, Lord Darnley and first Earl of Lennox.
Stronghow, Richard, second Earl of Pembroke and Strigul. See Clare, Richard de (d. 1176).		Stuart, Robert (1812-1848).	109
Strother, Edward (1675-1737).	62	Stuart, William (1755-1822).	109
Struthers, John (1778-1853).	63	Stuart-Wortley, Lady Emmeline Charlotte Elizabeth (1806-1855).	100
Strutt, Edward, first Baron Belper (1801-1880).	63	Stuart-Wortley, James Archibald (1805-1881). See under Stuart-Wortley-Mackenzie, James Archibald, first Baron Wharncliffe.
Strutt, Jacob George (fl. 1820-1860).	64	Stuart-Wortley, John, second Baron Wharncliffe (1801-1855). See under Stuart-Wortley-Mackenzie, James Archibald, first Baron Wharncliffe.
Strutt, Jedediah (1726-1797).	64	Stuart-Wortley-Mackenzie, James Archibald, first Baron Wharncliffe (1776-1845).	110
Strutt, Joseph (1749-1802).	65	Stubbs, George (1724-1806).	113
Strutt, Joseph (1776-1833). See under Strutt, Joseph (1749-1802).		Stubbs, George Towneley (1756-1815).	116
Strutt, Joseph (1766-1844). See under Strutt, Jedediah.		Stubbs, Stubbs, or Stubbe, Henry (1032-1073).	116
Strutt, William (1756-1880). See under Strutt, Jedediah.		Stubbs, Stubbs, or Stubbe, Henry (1006?-1678).	117
Strutt, William Goodday (1782-1848).	67	Stubbs or Stubbe, John (1548?-1591).	118
Strutt, William Thomas (1777-1860). See under Strutt, Joseph (1740-1802).		Stubbs or Stubbes, Philip (fl. 1581-1598).	119
Styrye, John (1648-1737).	67	Stubbs, Philip (1605-1738).	120
Strzelecki, Sir Paul Edmund de (1790-1878).	69	Stubbs, Thomas (fl. 1373).	121
Stuart. See also Stewart, Steward, and Stewart.		Stuckey or Stukely, Sir Lewis (d. 1020).	122
Stuart, Sir Alexander (1825-1880).	70	Stuckey or Stukely, Thomas (1525?-1578).	123
Stuart, Andrew (d. 1801).	71	Studloy, John (1545?-1590?).	126
Stuart or Stewart, Bernard or Bérault, third Seigneur of Aubigny (1417?-1508).	72	Stukeley. See also Stucley.
Stuart, Lord Bernard, titular Earl of Lichfield (1623?-1645).	73	Stukeley, William (1687-1766).	127
Stuart, Charles, sixth Duke of Lennox, third Duke of Richmond, and tenth Seigneur d'Aubigny (1630-1722).	76	Stump, Samuel John (d. 1838).	120
Stuart, Sir Charles (1758-1801).	74	Sturch, William (1763?-1888).	129
Stuart, Sir Charles, Baron Stuart de Rothesay (1779-1845).	75	Sturge, Joseph (1703-1859).	130
Stuart, Daniel (1766-1846).	75	Sturgeon, Henry (1781?-1814).	131
Stuart, Lord Dudley Coutts (1808-1854).	76	Sturgeon, William (1788-1850).	131
Stuart, Étienne, sixth Seigneur of Aubigny and first Duke of Lennox (1549?-1588).	77	Sturges, Octavius, M.D. (1883-1895).	135
Stuart or Stewart, Frances Teresa, Duchess of Richmond and Lennox (1047-1702).	80	Sturgeson, John (fl. 1861).	135
Stuart, Gilbert (1742-1780).	82	Sturt, Charles (1795-1809).	136
Stuart, Gilbert (1755-1828).	84	Sturt, John (1658-1780).	138
Stuart, Henry, Lord Darnley (1545-1567). See Stewart.		Stuteville, Robert de (d. 1186).	139
Stuart, Henry, Duke of Gloucester (1689-1680). See Henry.		Stuteville, William de (d. 1208). See under Stuteville, Robert de.
Stuart, Henry Windsor Villiers (1827-1895).	85	Style, William (1003-1679).	140
Stuart, James, fourth Duke of Lennox and first Duke of Richmond (1612-1655).	85	Styleman, Henry L'Estrange (1815-1882). See Le Strange.
Stuart, James (1713-1738).	86	Suckling, Alfred Inigo (1790-1856).	140
Stuart, James (d. 1708).	88	Suckling, Sir John (1609-1642).	140
Stuart, James (1741-1815). See under Stuart, James (d. 1708).		Suckling, Maurice (1725-1778).	140
Stuart, James (1764-1842).	89	Sudbury, Simon of (d. 1381).	146
Stuart, James (1775-1849).	90	Sudbury, William (fl. 1382).	149
Stuart, Sir James (1780-1853).	91	Suefred (fl. 695). See under Sigward.
Stuart or Stewart, Sir John of Darnley, Seigneur of Aubigny (1865?-1420).	92	Suett, Richard (1755-1805).	149
Stuart, John, third Earl of Bute (1713-1792).	92	Suffeld or Suthfeld, Walter (d. 1257), also called Walter Calthorp.	151
Stuart, John (1700?-1779). See under Stuart, Sir John (1759-1815).		Suffield, third Baron. See Harbord, Edward (1781-1835).
Stuart, Sir John (1750-1815).	98	Suffield, Robert Rodolph (1821-1891).	152
Stuart, John (1748-1821).	101	Suffolk, Dukes of. See Pole, William de la, first Duke, 1806-1450; Pole, John de la, second Duke, 1442-1491; Brandon, Charles, first Duke of the Brandon line,
Stuart, John (1812-1877).	102

- d.* 1545; Brandon, Henry, second Duke, 1537-1551; Brandon, Charles, third Duke, 1537?-1551; Grey, Henry, d. 1554.
- Suffolk, Duchess of. See Bertie Catharine (1520-1580).
- Suffolk, Earls of. See Ufford, Robert de, first Earl, 1208-1380; Ufford, William de, second Earl, 1380?-1382; Pole, Michael de la, first Earl of the Pole family, 1380?-1389; Pole, Michael de la, second Earl, 1381?-1415; Pole, Edmund de la, 1472?-1518; Howard, Thomas, first Earl of the Howard family, 1561-1626; Howard, Theophilus, second Earl, 1581-1640; Howard, James, third Earl, 1619-1888.
- Suffolk, Countess of. See Howard, Henrietta (1681-1707).
- Sugden, Edward Burtenshaw, Baron St. Leonards (1781-1873) . . . . . 152
- Suidbert (d. 718) . . . . . 155
- Sulcard or Sulgard (f. 1075) . . . . . 153
- Sulien, Sulgen (the old Welsh form), or Sulgenus (1011-1091) . . . . . 155
- Sullivan, Sir Bartholomew James (1810-1890) 156
- Sullivan, Thomas Ball (1780-1857) . . . . . 157
- Sullivan. See also O'Sullivan.
- Sullivan, Alexander Martin (1890-1884) . . . . . 157
- Sullivan, Barry (1821-1891) . . . . . 159
- Sullivan, Sir Edward (1822-1885) . . . . . 161
- Sullivan, Francis Stoughton (1719-1776) . . . . . 162
- Sullivan, Luke (d. 1771) . . . . . 162
- Sullivan, Owen (1700?-1784) . . . . . 162
- Sullivan, Sir Richard Joseph (1752-1808) . . . . . 163
- Sullivan, Robert (1800-1808) . . . . . 164
- Sullivan, Timothy (1710?-1800) . . . . . 164
- Sullivan, William Francois (1768-1830). See under Sullivan, Francis Stoughton.
- Sulmo, Thomas (f. 1540-1550). See Some.
- Sumbel, Mary (f. 1781-1812). See Wells, Mrs. Mary.
- Sumerled or Somerled, Lord of the Isles (d. 1104) . . . . . 184
- Summers, Charles (1827-1878) . . . . . 185
- Summers, Sir George (1554-1810). See Somers.
- Sumner, Charles Richard (1790-1874) . . . . . 165
- Sumner, John Bird (1780-1802) . . . . . 168
- Sumner, Robert Carey (1729-1771) . . . . . 170
- Sunderland, Earls of. See Spencer, Robert, second Earl, 1040-1702; Spencer, Charles, third Earl, 1074-1722.
- Sunderlin, Lord. See under Malone, Edmund (1741-1812).
- Sundon, Charlotte Clayton, Lady (d. 1742) . 170
- Sunman or Sonmans, William (d. 1708) . . . . . 171
- Surrene, John Thomas (1814-1878) . . . . . 172
- Surr, Thomas Skinner (1770-1847) . . . . . 172
- Surrey, Duke of. See Holland, Thomas (1874-1400).
- Surrey, Earls of. See Warenne, William de, first Earl, d. 1088; Warenne, William de, second Earl, d. 1188; Warenne, William de, third Earl, d. 1148; Warenne, Hamelin de, first Earl of Surrey and Warenne, d. 1202; Warenne, William de, second Earl of Surrey and Warenne, d. 1240; Warenne, John de, third Earl of Surrey and Warenne, 1281?-1304; Warenne, John de, fourth Earl of Surrey and Warenne, 1288-1847; Fitzalan, Richard, Earl of Arundel and Surrey, 1840-1807; Fitzalan, Thomas, Earl of Arundel and Surrey, 1881-1415; Howard, Thomas, Earl of Surrey and Duke of Norfolk, 1113-1524; Howard, Henry, Earl of Surrey, 1517?-1547; Howard, Thomas, Earl of Surrey and Duke of Norfolk, 1178-1551
- Surtees, Robert (1779-1834) . . . . . 178
- Surtees, Robert Smith (1803-1864) . . . . . 174
- Sussex, Kings of. See South Saxons.
- Sussex, Duke of. See Augustus Frederiok (1778-1548).
- Sussex, Earls of. See Radcliffe, Robert, first Earl, 1488-1512; Radcliffe, Thomas, third Earl, 1528?-1588; Savile, Thomas, 1590?-1658?
- Sutcliffe, Matthew (1550?-1029) . . . . . 175
- Sutcliffe, Thomas (1790?-1849) . . . . . 177
- Sutherland, Dukes of. See Leveson-Gower, George Granville, first Duke, 1758-1838; Leveson Gower, George Granville William Sutherland, third Duke (1828-1802), see under first Duke.
- Sutherland, Duchess of. See Leveson-Gower, Harriet Elizabeth Georgiana (1806-1888).
- Sutherland, Earls of. See Gordon, John, tenth or eleventh Earl, 1526?-1567; Gordon, John, fifteenth or sixteenth Earl, 1880?-1788.
- Sutherland, John (1808-1891) . . . . . 178
- Sutherland, Robert, sixth Earl (d. 1442). See under Sutherland, William, fourth Earl.
- Sutherland, William, second Earl (d. 1825) . 179
- Sutherland, William, fourth Earl (d. 1870) . 179
- Sutherland, William, fifth Earl (d. 1898?). See under Sutherland, William, fourth Earl.
- Sutfield, Walter de (d. 1257). See Suffeld.
- Sutton. See also Manners-Sutton.
- Sutton, Sir Charles (1775-1828) . . . . . 179
- Sutton, Christopher (1585?-1020) . . . . . 180
- Sutton, John de, Baron Dudley (1401?-1487). See Dudley, John.
- Sutton, Oliver (d. 1209) . . . . . 180
- Sutton, Sir Richard (d. 1524) . . . . . 181
- Sutton, Sir Richard (1798-1855) . . . . . 182
- Sutton, Robert, first Baron Lexington (1594-1668) . . . . . 183
- Sutton, Robert, second Baron Lexington (1061-1728) . . . . . 184
- Sutton, Thomas (1592-1811) . . . . . 185
- Sutton, Thomas (1585-1823) . . . . . 187
- Sutton, Thomas (1767?-1885) . . . . . 188
- Swadlin, Thomas, D.D. (1600-1870) . . . . . 188
- Swaffham, Robert of (d. 1278?). See Robert.
- Swain, Charles (1801-1874) . . . . . 189
- Swain, Joseph (1781-1798) . . . . . 190
- Swaine, Francis (d. 1782) . . . . . 100
- Swaine, John (1775-1880) . . . . . 190
- Swains, John Barak (1815?-1888). See under Swains, John.
- Swainson, Charles Anthony (1820-1887) . . . . . 191
- Swainson, William (1789-1855) . . . . . 192
- Swainson, William (1800-1888) . . . . . 193
- Swale, Sir Richard (1545?-1608) . . . . . 104
- Swan, Joseph (1781-1874) . . . . . 195
- Swan, William (1818-1894) . . . . . 196
- Swanley, Richard (d. 1850) . . . . . 196
- Swansea, Lord. See Vivian, Sir Henry Hussey (1821-1894).
- Sweet, Robert (1783-1835) . . . . . 197
- Sweetman, John (1752-1826) . . . . . 197
- Sweetman, Milo (d. 1890) . . . . . 198
- Swereford, Alexander de (1176?-1248) . . . . . 199
- Swete or Tripe, John (1762?-1821) . . . . . 200

	PAGE		PAGE
Swetnam, Joseph ( f. 1817) . . . . .	200	Sylvester, Matthew (1686 ?-1708) . . . . .	204
Swetnam, Sweetnam, or Sweetman, Joseph (1577-1922). See under Swetnam, Joseph.		Syme, Ebenezer (1826-1890) . . . . .	265
Sweyn or Svein ( d. 1014) . . . . .	201	Syme, James (1799-1870) . . . . .	266
Sweyn or Swegen ( d. 1053) . . . . .	203	Syme, John (1755-1831) . . . . .	267
Swift, Doane (1707-1788). See under Swift, Theophilus.		Syme, John (1795-1861) . . . . .	267
Swift, Jonathan (1667-1745) . . . . .	204	Syme, Patrick (1774-1845) . . . . .	267
Swift, Robert (1584 ?-1590) . . . . .	207	Symeon. See Simeon.
Swift, Theophilus (1746-1815) . . . . .	208	Symes, Michael (1753 ?-1809) . . . . .	268
Swinburne, Henry (1560 ?-1628) . . . . .	208	Symington, Andrew (1785-1853) . . . . .	269
Swinburne, Henry (1743-1803) . . . . .	220	Symington, William (1763-1831) . . . . .	269
Swinden, Henry (1716-1772) . . . . .	221	Symington, William (1795-1862) . . . . .	270
Swinden, Tobias ( d. 1710) . . . . .	221	Symmons, Charles (1740-1828) . . . . .	270
Swinerote, Lawronco ( f. 1254). See Somerote.		Symmons, John (1781-1842). See under Symmons, Charles.
Swineshead, Richard ( f. 1350) . . . . .	231	Symon Simeonis ( f. 1822). See Simeonis.
Swiney, George (1786 ?-1844) . . . . .	232	Symonds, John (1780-1807) . . . . .	271
Swiney, George (1780-1808). See under Swiney, George (1780 ?-1844).		Symonds, John Addington (1807-1871) . . . . .	272
Swiney, Owen Mac ( d. 1754). See Swinny.		Symonds, John Addington (1840-1808) . . . . .	272
Swinfen, John (1612-1694). See Swynfon.		Symonds, Richard (1009-1080 ?) . . . . .	275
Swinfield or Swynfield, Richard de ( d. 1817) . . . . .	232	Symonds, Richard (1617-1692 ?) . . . . .	276
Swinford, Catherine ( d. 1403). See Swynford.		Symonds, Sir Thomas Matthew Charles (1813-1894) . . . . .	277
Swinerton, Thomas ( d. 1554) . . . . .	231	Symonds, William, D.D. (1550-1616 ?) . . . . .	278
Swinnock, George (1627-1673) . . . . .	235	Symonds, Sir William (1782-1850) . . . . .	278
Swinny, Owen Mac, otherwise known as Owen MacSwinny ( d. 1754) . . . . .	235	Symonds, William Samuel (1818-1887) . . . . .	279
Swinshed, Richard ( f. 1350). See Swineshead.		Symons, Benjamin Parsons (1735-1878) . . . . .	280
Swinton, Alexander, Lord Mersington (1025 ?-1700) . . . . .	236	Symons, Jelling Cookson (1809-1800) . . . . .	280
Swinton, Archibald Campbell (1812-1806). See under Swinton, James Rannie.		Sympson, Christopher (1695 ?-1669). See Simpson.
Swinton, James Rannie (1816-1888) . . . . .	236	Sympson, William (1627 ?-1671). See Simpson.
Swinton, Sir John ( d. 1402) . . . . .	237	Symson or Sympson, Patrick (1560-1618). See Simon.
Swinton, John (1621 ?-1673) . . . . .	237	Syndcomb, Miles ( d. 1657). See Sindercombe.
Swinton, John (1768-1777) . . . . .	239	Synge, Charles (1780-1854) . . . . .	331
Swinton, John, Lord Swinton ( d. 1799) . . . . .	239	Synge, Edward ( d. 1679). See under Synge, Edward (1659-1741).
Swiny, Owen Mac ( d. 1754). See Swinny.		Synge, Edward (1659-1741) . . . . .	231
Swithun, Saint ( d. 863) . . . . .	200	Synge, George (1594-1633). See under Synge, Edward (1659-1741).
Switzer, Stephen (1682 ?-1745) . . . . .	241	Synge, William Webb Follett (1826-1891) . . . . .	233
Swynfen or Swinfen, John (1612-1694) . . . . .	242	Syntax, Doctor. See Combe, William (1741-1820).
Swynfen or Swinfen, Samuel (1679-1734). See under Swynfen or Swinfen, John.		Syracuse (Syracusanus), Richard of ( d. 1135). See Palmer.
Swynford, Catherine, Duchess of Lancaster (1650 ?-1403) . . . . .	243
Swynford, Sir Thomas (1668 ?-1498). See under Swynford, Catherine, Duchess of Lancaster.
Sybothorpe, Robert ( d. 1662). See Silthorpe.
Syddall, Henry ( d. 1572). See Siddall.
Sydenham, Baron. See Thomson, Charles Edward Poulett (1799-1841).
Sydenham or Sidenham, Cuthbert (1622-1654) . . . . .	244	Taafe, Denis (1743 ?-1818) . . . . .	284
Sydenham, Floyer (1710-1787) . . . . .	245	Taafe, Francis, fourth Viscount Taafe and third Earl of Carlingford (1839-1704) . . . . .	284
Sydenham, Humphrey (1591-1650 ?) . . . . .	245	Taafe, John ( f. 1685-1708) . . . . .	235
Sydenham, John (1807-1846) . . . . .	246	Taafe, Nicholas, sixth Viscount Taafe (1677-1709) . . . . .	236
Sydenham, Thomas (1624-1680) . . . . .	246	Taafe, Theobald, second Viscount Taafe and first Earl of Carlingford ( d. 1677) . . . . .	237
Sydenham, William (1615-1601) . . . . .	238	Taafe, Sir William ( d. 1627) . . . . .	238
Sydney. See Sidney.		Tabloy, Barons de. See Leicester, Sir John Fleming, 1762-1827; Warren, John Byrne Leicester, 1835-1895.
Sydney, first Viscount. See Townshend, Thomas (1788-1800).		Tabor or Talbor, Sir Robert (1642 ?-1681) . . . . .	288
Sydeserff, Thomas (1561-1663) . . . . .	255	Taché, Alexandre Antonin (1828-1894) . . . . .	289
Sykes, Arthur Ashley (1684 ?-1759) . . . . .	255	Taché, Sir Etienne Pascal (1795-1865) . . . . .	290
Sykes, Godfrey (1825-1890) . . . . .	256	Taché, Jean Charles (1820-1899). See under Taché, Alexandre Antonin.
Sykes, Sir Mark Masterman (1771-1823) . . . . .	256	Tagart, Edward (1804-1858) . . . . .	290
Sykes, Sir Tatton (1772-1868) . . . . .	257	Tagioni, Marie (1809-1884) . . . . .	291
Sykes, William Henry (1790-1872) . . . . .	259	Tailor. See also Tayler and Taylor.
Sylvester. See also Silvester.		Tailor, Robert ( f. 1614) . . . . .	292
Sylvester, James Joseph (1814-1897) . . . . .	258	Taircell ( d. 690). See Daircell.
Sylvester, Josiah (1593-1618) . . . . .	260	Tait, Archibald Campbell (1811-1882) . . . . .	292
		Tait, James Haldane (1771-1845) . . . . .	293

	PAGE		PAGE
Tait, William (1798-1864) . . . . .	800	Tans'ur, William (1099?-1783) . . . . .	868
Talbot, Catherine (1791-1770) . . . . .	800	Tanswell, John (1800-1864) . . . . .	868
Talbot, Charles, twelfth Earl and only Duke of Shrewsbury (1660-1718) . . . . .	801	Tany, Thomas ( f.l. 1649-1655) . . . . .	868
Talbot, Charles, Baron Talbot of Hensol (1685-1787) . . . . .	307	Tenymarian (1822-1885). See Stephen, Edward.
Talbot, Sir Charles Chetwynd, second Earl Talbot of Hensol (1777-1849) . . . . .	808	Tapp, John ( f.l. 1596-1615) . . . . .	864
Talbot, Edward (1555-1595). See Kelley.		Tara, Viscount. See Preston, Thomas (1585-1653?).
Talbot, Elizabeth, Countess of Shrewsbury (1518-1608) . . . . .	809	Tarbat, Viscount. See Mackenzie, George (1680-1714).
Talbot, Francis, fifth Earl of Shrewsbury (1500-1500) . . . . .	811	Tarleton, Sir Banastre (1754-1838) . . . . .	864
Talbot, George, fourth Earl of Shrewsbury and Earl of Waterford (1468-1588) . . . . .	813	Tarlton, Richard ( d. 1559) . . . . .	869
Talbot, George, sixth Earl of Shrewsbury (1528?-1590) . . . . .	814	Tarras, Earl of. See Scott, Walter (1644-1698).
Talbot, Gilbert de, first Baron Talbot (1277?-1348) . . . . .	816	Tarring, John (1808-1875) . . . . .	871
Talbot, Gilbert, seventh Earl of Shrewsbury (1563-1616) . . . . .	817	Tarver, Edward John (1841-1891). See under Tarver, John Charles.
Talbot, James, first Baron Talbot de Malahide in his peerage of the United Kingdom (1805-1888) . . . . .	818	Tarver, John Charles (1790-1851) . . . . .	871
Talbot, John, first Earl of Shrewsbury (1388?-1458) . . . . .	819	Taschereau, Elzéar Alexandre (1820-1898) . . . . .	872
Talbot, John, second Earl of Shrewsbury (1418?-1460) . . . . .	823	Tasler, William (1740-1800) . . . . .	878
Talbot, Sir John (1709?-1851) . . . . .	824	Tassie, James (1735-1799) . . . . .	874
Talbot, Mary Anne (1778-1868) . . . . .	825	Tassie, William (1777-1860) . . . . .	875
Talbot, Montague (1774-1881) . . . . .	820	Taswell-Langmead, Thomas Pitt (1840-1882). See Langmead.
Talbot, Peter (1620-1880) . . . . .	827	Tate, Alexander Norman (1887-1892) . . . . .	876
Talbot, Richard de, second Baron Talbot (1802?-1850) . . . . .	829	Tate, Christopher (1811-1841) . . . . .	876
Talbot, Richard ( d. 1440) . . . . .	830	Tate, Francis (1500-1616) . . . . .	876
Talbot, Richard, Earl and titular Duke of Tyrconnel (1630-1601) . . . . .	831	Tate, George (1745-1821) . . . . .	877
Talbot, Robert (1505?-1558) . . . . .	830	Tate, George (1805-1871) . . . . .	877
Talbot, Thomas ( f.l. 1580) . . . . .	837	Tate, James (1771-1848) . . . . .	878
Talbot, Thomas (1771-1853) . . . . .	837	Tate, Nahum (1652-1715) . . . . .	879
Talbot, Sir William ( d. 1683) . . . . .	838	Tate, Thomas (1807-1888) . . . . .	880
Talbot, William (1660?-1730) . . . . .	839	Tate, William 1760?-1806) . . . . .	881
Talbot, William Henry Fox (1800-1877) . . . . .	839	Tate, Zouch (1000-1050). See under Tate, Francis.
Talboys, David Alphonso (1790?-1840) . . . . .	841	Tatham, Charles Heathcote (1772-1842) . . . . .	881
Talboys, Gilbert, Lord Talboys ( d. 1530). See under Talboys or Tailboys, Sir William.		Tatham, Edward (1749-1884) . . . . .	882
Talboys or Tailboys, Sir William, styled Lord of Kyme ( d. 1464) . . . . .	841	Tatham, John ( f.l. 1092-1664) . . . . .	884
Talfourd, Francis (1828-1802) . . . . .	842	Tatham, William (1752-1819) . . . . .	885
Talfourd, Sir Thomas Noon (1795-1854) . . . . .	843	Tattam, Henry, D.D. (1780-1868) . . . . .	886
Talhaiarn (1810-1869). See Jones, John.		Tattersall, George (1817-1849). See under Tattersall, Richard.
Taliesin ( f.l. 550) . . . . .	846	Tattersall, Richard (1724-1705) . . . . .	887
Tallents, Francis (1610-1708) . . . . .	847	Tattersall, William do Chair (1752-1829) . . . . .	888
Tallis, Thomas (1510?-1585) . . . . .	848	Tatwin, Tatwin, or Tadwinus ( d. 734) . . . . .	889
Talman, John ( d. 1726). See under Talman, William.		Taubman, Matthew ( d. 1630?) . . . . .	890
Talman, William ( f.l. 1070-1700) . . . . .	351	Taubman, Nathaniel ( d. 1720?). See under Taubman, Matthew.
Talmash, Thomas (1861?-1604). See Tolle-mache.		Taunton, Lord. See Labouchere, Henry (1798-1860).
Talsarn (1706-1857). See Jones, John.		Taunton, John (1709-1821) . . . . .	890
Tancred, Christopher (1680-1754) . . . . .	852	Taunton, Sir William Elias (1778-1885) . . . . .	891
Tandy, James Napper (1740-1803) . . . . .	858	Tantphoeus, Baroness von, originally Jemima Montgomery (1807-1803) . . . . .	891
Tanfield, Sir Lawrence ( d. 1625) . . . . .	857	Taverner, John ( f.l. 1580) . . . . .	892
Tankerville, Earls of. See Grey, John, d. 1421; Grey, Forde, d. 1701.		Taverner, John (1684-1688). See under Taverner, Richard.
Tannahill, Robert (1774-1810) . . . . .	857	Taverner, Richard (1605?-1575) . . . . .	898
Tanner, John Sigismund ( d. 1775) . . . . .	858	Taverner, Roger ( d. 1562). See under Taverner, Richard.
Tanner, Thomas (1830-1082) . . . . .	850	Taverner, William ( d. 1781) . . . . .	896
Tanner, Thomas (1874-1785) . . . . .	859	Taverner, William (1708-1773). See under Taverner, William ( d. 1781).
Tanner, Thomas Hawks (1824-1871) . . . . .	863	Taxster or Tayster, John de ( d. 1285?) . . . . .	898
Tannock, James (1784-1868) . . . . .	863	Taylor. See also Tailor and Taylor.
		Taylor, Charles Benjamin (1797-1876) . . . . .	897
		Taylor, Frederick (1802-1880) . . . . .	898
		Taylor, John James (1797-1800) . . . . .	899
		Taylor, Joseph Needham (1785-1864) . . . . .	400
		Taylor, William (1808-1892) . . . . .	400
		Taylor. See also Tailor and Taylor.
		Taylor, Abraham ( f.l. 1727-1740) . . . . .	402
		Taylor, Alfred Swains (1806-1860) . . . . .	402

	PAGE		PAGE
Taylor, Mrs. Ann (1757-1880). See under		Taylor, Policarpus (d. 1780) . . . . .	432
Taylor, Isaac (1750-1829).		Taylor, Roynell George (1822-1886) . . . . .	437
Taylor, Ann (1782-1860). See Gilbert, Mrs.		Taylor, Richard (1781-1858) . . . . .	437
Ann.		Taylor, Richard Cowling (1789-1851) . . . . .	438
Taylor, Brook (1685-1781) . . . . .	404	Taylor, Robert (1710-1792) . . . . .	439
Taylor, Sir Brook (1776-1848). See under		Taylor, Sir Robert (1714-1788) . . . . .	440
Taylor, Sir Horbert.		Taylor, Robert (1784-1844) . . . . .	401
Taylor, Charles (1756-1828) . . . . .	405	Taylor, Rowland (d. 1555) . . . . .	408
Taylor, Christopher (d. 1686). See under		Taylor, Samuel (1749-1811) . . . . .	464
Taylor, Thomas (1618-1682).		Taylor, Silas (1824-1078). See Donville.
Taylor, Dan (1783-1810) . . . . .	405	Taylor, Simon (d. 1772) . . . . .	465
Taylor, Edgar (1798-1839) . . . . .	407	Taylor, Susannah (1755-1823). See under
Taylor, Edward (1784-1869) . . . . .	407	Taylor, John (1750-1826).
Taylor, Emily (1795-1872). See under Taylor,		Taylor, Thomas (1570-1688) . . . . .	465
Edgar.		Taylor, Thomas (1618-1682) . . . . .	466
Taylor, George Ledwell (1788-1878) . . . . .	408	Taylor, Thomas (1783-1816) . . . . .	467
Taylor, Harriette Deborah (1807-1874). See		Taylor, Thomas (1768-1885) . . . . .	468
Lacy.		Taylor, Thomas (d. 1848) . . . . .	470
Taylor, Helen (1818-1885) See under Taylor,		Taylor, Thomas Edward (1811-1883) . . . . .	471
Isaac (1760-1829).		Taylor, Thomas Glanville (1804-1848) . . . . .	471
Taylor, Henry (1711-1785) . . . . .	409	Taylor, Tom (1817-1880) . . . . .	472
Taylor, Sir Henry (1800-1886) . . . . .	410	Taylor, William (d. 1423) . . . . .	474
Taylor, Sir Herbert (1775-1839) . . . . .	412	Taylor, William (1705-1836) . . . . .	474
Taylor, Isaac (1780-1807) . . . . .	414	Taylor, William Benjamin Sarsfield (1781-
Taylor, Isaac (1769-1820) . . . . .	415	1850) . . . . .	477
Taylor, Isaac (1787-1805) . . . . .	417	Taylor, William Cooke (1800-1840) . . . . .	478
Taylor, James (1745-1797). See under Taylor,		Taylor, Wittewronge (1719 ?-1760) . . . . .	479
Isaac (1780-1807).		Taylor, Zachary (1658-1705) . . . . .	480
Taylor, James (1763-1825) . . . . .	419	Teach or Thatch, Edward (d. 1718) . . . . .	481
Taylor, James (1788-1808). See under Taylor,		Teddeinan, Sir Thomas (d. 1698 ?) . . . . .	482
John (1781-1804).		Teeling, Bartholomew (1774-1798) . . . . .	483
Taylor, James (1818-1892) . . . . .	420	Teeling, Charles Hamilton (1778-1850). See
Taylor, Jane (1783-1824) . . . . .	420	under Teeling, Bartholomew.
Taylor, Jefferys (1792-1853) . . . . .	422	Teesdale, Sir Christopher Charles (1833-1893) 428
Taylor, Jeremy, D.D. (1618-1687) . . . . .	422	Tegai (1805-1864). See Hughes, Hugh.
Taylor, John (d. 1534) . . . . .	423	Tegg, Thomas (1776-1845) . . . . .	486
Taylor, John (1509 ?-1554) . . . . .	420	Tegg, William (1816-1895) . . . . .	467
Taylor, John (d. 1556). See Cardmaker.		Tegid (1792-1852). See Jones, John.
Taylor, John (1580-1683) . . . . .	481	Teignmouth, Baron. See Shore, John, first
Taylor, John (1600 ?-1655) . . . . .	438	Baron (1751-1834).
Taylor, John (1694-1701) . . . . .	439	Tello (d. 550) . . . . .	487
Taylor, John (1704-1760) . . . . .	440	Telfair, Charles (1777 ?-1888) . . . . .	488
Taylor, John (1708-1772) . . . . .	441	Telfer, James (1800-1802) . . . . .	498
Taylor, John (1724-1777). See under Taylor,		Telford, Thomas (1757-1834) . . . . .	489
John (1708-1772).		Telnog (1840-1805). See Evans, Thomas.
Taylor, John (1711-1788) . . . . .	442	Tempest, Pierce (1658-1717) . . . . .	494
Taylor, John (1745 ?-1806). See under Taylor,		Temple, Earl. See Granville, Richard Temple
John (1789-1888).		(1711-1770).
Taylor, John (d. 1808) . . . . .	443	Temple, Henry, first Viscount Palmerston
Taylor, John (1748-1818). See under Taylor,		(1078 ?-1757) . . . . .	495
Dan.		Temple, Henry, second Viscount Palmerston
Taylor, John (d. 1821). See under Taylor,		(1780-1802) . . . . .	496
John (d. 1808).		Temple, Henry John, third Viscount Palmer-
Taylor, John (1750-1826) . . . . .	444	ston in the peerage of Ireland (1784-1805) .
Taylor, John (1757-1882) . . . . .	445	Temple, James (d. 1640-1608) . . . . .	518
Taylor, John (1789-1888) . . . . .	446	Temple, Sir John (1000-1077) . . . . .	514
Taylor, Sir John (1771-1843) . . . . .	446	Temple, Sir John (1682-1704). See under
Taylor, John (1779-1808). See under Taylor,		Temple, Sir John (1600-1077).
Philip.		Temple, Sir Peter (1602-1658). See under
Taylor, John (1781-1804) . . . . .	440	Temple, Sir Richard (1694-1697).
Taylor, John (1820-1808) . . . . .	447	Temple, Peter (1000-1068) . . . . .	516
Taylor, John Edward (1701-1844) . . . . .	448	Temple, Sir Richard (1084-1697) . . . . .	517
Taylor, John Ellor (1887-1805) . . . . .	450	Temple, Sir Richard, Viscount Cobham
Taylor, John Sydney (1795-1841) . . . . .	450	(1669 ?-1740) . . . . .	518
Taylor, Joseph (1586 ?-1058 ?) . . . . .	451	Temple, Sir Thomas (1614-1674) . . . . .	520
Taylor, Meadows, whose full name was Philip		Temple, Sir William (1555-1627) . . . . .	520
Meadows Taylor (1808-1876) . . . . .	452	Temple, Sir William (1628-1099) . . . . .	522
Taylor, Michael Angelo (1757-1884) . . . . .	453	Temple, William Johnstone or Johnson (1780-
Taylor, Michael Waistell (1824-1802) . . . . .	453	1790) . . . . .	531
Taylor, Peter or Patriok (1756-1788) . . . . .	455	Templeman, Peter, M.D. (1711-1769) . . . . .	533
Taylor, Peter Alfred (1819-1891) . . . . .	455	Templeton, John (1700-1825) . . . . .	534
Taylor, Philip (1786-1870) . . . . .	456	Templeton, John (1802-1886) . . . . .	535

	PAGE		PAGE
Templo, Richard de ( f. 1100-1229). See Richard.		Theobald, Lewis (1898-1744) . . . . .	598
Tench, Watkin (1759?-1838) . . . . .	535	Theodore (692?-690) . . . . .	602
Tenison, Edward (1878-1735) . . . . .	530	Theodore, Etienne ( d. 1756). See under Frederick, Colonel (1725?-1797).
Tenison, Richard (1840?-1705) . . . . .	530	Therry, John Joseph (1791-1884) . . . . .	606
Tenison, Thomas (1080-1715) . . . . .	537	Therry, Sir Roger (1800-1874) . . . . .	606
Tennant, Charles (1768-1888) . . . . .	540	Thesiger, Alfred Henry (1888-1880) . . . . .	607
Tennant, Hamilton Tovey- (1732-1886). See Tovey-Tennant.		Thesiger, Sir Frederick ( d. 1805) . . . . .	607
Tennant, Sir James (1789-1854) . . . . .	541	Thesiger, Frederick, first Baron Chelmsford (1764-1878) . . . . .	608
Tennant, James (1808-1881) . . . . .	542	Thew, Robert (1758-1803) . . . . .	609
Tennant, Smitheon (1781-1815) . . . . .	543	Theyer, John (1697-1878) . . . . .	810
Tennant, William (1784-1848) . . . . .	544	Thicknesse, formerly Ford, Ann (1787-1824) . . . . .	610
Tennant, Sir James Emerson (1804-1869) . . . . .	545	Thicknesse, George (1714-1790) . . . . .	611
Tennyson, Alfred, first Baron Tennyson (1809-1892) . . . . .	548	Thicknesse, Philip (1719-1792) . . . . .	612
Tennyson, Charles (1808-1879). See Turner, Charles Tennyson.		Thierry, Charles Philip Hippolytus, Baron de (1708-1864) . . . . .	614
Tennyson, Frederick (1807-1898) . . . . .	558	Thimelby, Richard (1814-1680). See Ashby.
Tenterden, titular Earl of. See Hales, Sir Edward ( d. 1898).		Thirlby, Styan (1888?-1758) . . . . .	614
Tenterden, Barons. See Abbott, Charles, first Baron, 1702-1832; Abbott, Charles Stuart Aubrey, third Baron, 1834-1882.		Thirlby or Thirleby, Thomas (1506?-1570) . . . . .	615
Teonge, Henry (1621-1690) . . . . .		Thirlstane, Lord Maitland of. See Maitland, Sir John (1545?-1595).
Terill, Anthony (1821-1870). See Bonville.		Thirlwall, Connop (1797-1875) . . . . .	618
Ternan or Terrenan ( d. 481?) . . . . .		Thirlwall, Thomas ( d. 1827). See under Thirlwall, Connop.
Ternan, Frances Eleanor (1808?-1878). See Jarman.		Thirning, William ( d. 1413) . . . . .	621
Terne, Christopher, M.D. (1830-1878) . . . . .	557	Thistlowood, Arthur (1770-1820) . . . . .	622
Terrick, Richard (1710-1777) . . . . .	558	Thom, Alexander (1801-1870) . . . . .	626
Terrien de la Couperie, Albert Etienne Jean Baptiste ( d. 1894) . . . . .	559	Thom, James ( f. 1815). See under Thom, James (1802-1850).
Terrias, William (1847-1897) . . . . .	560	Thom, James (1802-1850) . . . . .	625
Terrot, Charles (1758-1830) . . . . .	581	Thom, John Hamilton (1808-1894) . . . . .	626
Terrot, Charles Hughes (1790-1879) . . . . .	583	Thom, John Nichols (1799-1838). See Tom.
Terry, Daniel (1780?-1820) . . . . .	583	Thom, Walter (1770-1824). See under Thom, Alexander.
Terry, Edward (1690-1660) . . . . .	590	Thom, William (1798?-1848) . . . . .	627
Terry or Tirreye, John (1555?-1825) . . . . .	597	Thomas, Earl of Lancaster (1277?-1822) . . . . .	628
Tesdale, Teesdale, or Tisdale, Thomas (1547-1610) . . . . .	597	Thomas of Brotherton, Earl of Norfolk and Marshal of England (1800-1888) . . . . .	632
Tesimond, alias Greenway, Oswald (1583-1886), also known as Philip Beaumont . . . . .	567	Thomas of Woodstock, Earl of Buckingham and Duke of Gloucester (1355-1397) . . . . .	633
Teviot, Earl of. See Rutherford, Andrew ( d. 1864).		Thomas, Duke of Clarence (1338?-1421) . . . . .	638
Teviot, Viscount. See Livingstone, Sir Thomas (1652?-1711).		Thomas of Bayeux ( d. 1100) . . . . .	640
Tewkesbury, John ( f. 1850). See Tunsted, Simon.		Thomas ( d. 1114) . . . . .	643
Thackeray, Francis (1708-1842) . . . . .		Thomas, known as Thomas & Becket (1118?-1170) . . . . .	645
Thackeray, Frederick Rennell (1775-1860) . . . . .		Thomas, known as Thomas Brown ( f. 1170). See Walleys.
Thackeray, George (1777-1850) . . . . .		Thomas de Wykes ( f. 1258-1298). See Wykes.
Thackeray, William Makepeace (1811-1888) . . . . .		Thomas of Erceldoune, or Thomas the Rhymer ( f. 1220?-1297?). See Erceldoune.
Thackwell, Sir Joseph (1781-1859) . . . . .		Thomas of Corbridge ( d. 1304). See Corbridge.
Thackwell, Osbert Dabish (1887-1858). See under Thackwell, Sir Joseph.		Thomas the Englishman ( d. 1810). See Jorz or Joyce, Thomas.
Thane, John (1748-1818) . . . . .	587	Thomas Hibernicus or de Hibernia ( f. 1808-1816), known also as Palmeranus or Palmerston . . . . .	654
Thanet, Earl of. See Tufon, Sackville, ninth Earl (1787-1825).		Thomas de Hibernia ( d. 1270). See under Thomas Hibernicus.
Tham, Philip de ( f. 1120). See Philip.		Thomas de la More ( f. 1327-1347). See More.
Thayre, Thomas ( f. 1008-1825) . . . . .	587	Thomas of Hatfield ( d. 1881). See Hatfield.
Thackston, Joseph (1772-1842) . . . . .	588	Thomas of Ashborne ( f. 1822) . . . . .	655
Theed, William (1764-1817). See under Theed, William (1804-1891).		Thomas Ashburne ( f. 1834). See under Thomas of Ashborne.
Theed, William (1804-1891) . . . . .	588
Theinred ( f. 1871) . . . . .	589
Theinsson, Peter (1787-1797) . . . . .	589
Thelwall, Algernon Sydney (1795-1868). See under Thelwall, John.
Thelwall, Sir Eubule (1562-1630) . . . . .	590
Thelwall, John (1784-1884) . . . . .	590
Theobald or Teobaldus ( d. 1161) . . . . .	598

	PAGE		PAGE
Thomas de Newenham ( f. 1308). See Newenham.		Thompson, Edward (1788?-1786) .	689
Thomas of Newmarket ( f. 1410?) .	655	Thompson, George (1804-1878) .	691
Thomas Netter or Walden ( d. 1430). See Netter.		Thompson, Gilbert (1728-1808) .	691
Thomas the Bastard ( d. 1471). See Fauconberg, Thomas.		Thompson, Sir Harry Stephen Maysey (1800-1874) .	691
Thomas ab Ieuan ap Rhys ( d. 1617?) .	855	Thompson, Henry (1797-1878) .	693
Thomas of St. Gregory (1584-1644). See Hill, Thomas.		Thompson, Henry Langhorne (1820-1856) .	698
Thomas, Arthur Goring (1850-1892) .	650	Thompson, Jacob (1805-1879) .	694
Thomas, David (1700?-1822) .	650	Thompson, James (1817-1877) .	694
Thomas, David (1813-1894) .	657	Thompson, Thomson, or Tomson, John ( f. 1882) .	695
Thomas, Edward (1813-1880) .	658	Thompson, Sir John, first Baron Haversham (1647-1710) .	695
Thomas, Elizabeth (1677-1731) .	658	Thompson, John (1776-1864) .	698
Thomas, Ernest Chester (1850-1892) .	659	Thompson, John (1785-1806) .	697
Thomas, Francis Sheppard (1704?-1857) .	660	Thompson, Sir John Sparrow David (1844-1894) .	697
Thomas, Frederick Jennings (1788-1855) .	660	Thompson, John Vaughan (1779-1847) .	698
Thomas, George (1730?-1802) .	661	Thompson, Sir Matthew William (1820-1891) .	700
Thomas, George Housman (1824-1898) .	662	Thompson, Pishay (1784-1862) .	700
Thomas, Honoratus Leigh (1769-1840) .	662	Thompson, Samuel (1760-1837) .	701
Thomas, John (1001-1706) .	668	Thompson, Theophilus (1807-1800) .	702
Thomas, John (1000-1781) .	668	Thompson, Thomas (1708?-1773) .	702
Thomas, John (1712-1709) .	664	Thompson, Thomas (1817-1878). See Thomson.
Thomas, John (1613-1862) .	664	Thompson, Sir Thomas Boulden (1766?-1828) .	708
Thomas, John (1705-1871) .	665	Thompson, Thomas Perronet (1788-1880) .	704
Thomas, John (1821-1892) .	665	Thompson or Thomson, Sir William (1788-1739) .	700
Thomas, John Evan (1809-1878) .	668	Thompson, William (1712?-1760?) .	707
Thomas, John Fryor (1797-1877) .	668	Thompson, William (1780?-1800) .	707
Thomas, John Wesley (1788-1872). See under Thomas, Joshua ( d. 1759?).	667	Thompson, William (1805-1852) .	707
Thomas, Joshua (1710-1707) .	667	Thompson, William (1811-1880) .	708
Thomas, Joshua (1710-1797) .	667	Thompson, William Hepworth (1810-1880) .	708
Thomas, Lewis ( f. 1587-1010) .	668	Thoms, William John (1808-1885) .	710
Thomas, Matthew Evan (1788?-1830) .	668	Thomson. See also Thompson, Tompson, and Tomson.
Thomas, Sir Noah (1720-1702) .	668	Thomson, Alexander (1768-1808) .	712
Thomas, Owen (1812-1891) .	669	Thomson, Alexander (1817-1875) .	713
Thomas, Richard (1777-1857) .	670	Thomson, Allen (1806-1884) .	718
Thomas, Samuel (1627-1698) .	670	Thomson, Andrew Mitchell (1779-1881) .	714
Thomas, Sidney Gilchrist (1860-1885) .	672	Thomson, Anthony Todd (1778-1840) .	715
Thomas, Thomas (1553-1888) .	672	Thomson, Charles Edward Poulett, Baron Sydenham (1799-1841) .	710
Thomas, Vaughan (1775-1858) .	678	Thomson, Sir Charles Wyville (1830-1882) .	717
Thomas, William ( d. 1584) .	678	Thomson, David ( d. 1815). See under Thomson, George (1757-1851).
Thomas, William (1590-1007) .	678	Thomson, David (1817-1880) .	718
Thomas, William (1618-1689) .	677	Thomson, Sir Edward Deas (1800-1879) .	719
Thomas, William, D.D. (1070-1788) .	679	Thomson, George ( f. 1648-1668) .	720
Thomas, William ( f. 1780-1704) .	679	Thomson, George ( f. 1648-1870) .	720
Thomas, William (Islwyn) (1832-1878) .	680	Thomson, George (1782?-1888) .	721
Thomason, Sir Edward (1709-1840) .	680	Thomson, George (1757-1851) .	722
Thomason, George ( d. 1080) .	681	Thomson, George (1790-1886) .	722
Thomason, James (1804-1858) .	682	Thomson, Henry (1778-1848) .	724
Thomasson, Thomas (1808-1870) .	688	Thomson, Henry William (Byerley) (1822-1897) .	725
Thomlinson or Tomlinson, Matthew (1017-1681) .	684	Thomson, James (1700-1748) .	726
Thomlinson, Robert (1008-1748) .	685	Thomson, James (1786-1849) .	724
Thomond, Marquis of. See O'Brien, James, third Marquis (1769-1855).		Thomson, James (1788-1850) .	725
Thomond, Earls of. See O'Brien, Murrough, first Earl, d. 1551; O'Brien, Conor, third Earl, 1584?-1681; O'Brien, Donogh, fourth Earl, d. 1824; O'Brien, Barnabas, sixth Earl, d. 1857.		Thomson, James (1768-1855) .	726
Thompson. See also Thomson, Tompson, and Tomson.		Thomson, James (1884-1882) .	730
Thompson, Sir Benjamin, Count von Rumford (1753-1814) .	695	Thomson, James (1800-1888) .	727
Thompson, Benjamin (1776?-1816) .	698	Thomson, James (1822-1892) .	727
Thompson, Charles (1740?-1700) .	680	Thomson, James Bruce (1810-1878) .	728
Thompson, Charles (1701-1840). See under Thompson, John (1788-1850).		Thomson, John (1778-1840) .	729
Thompson, Charles Thurston (1810-1808). See under Thompson, John (1788-1850).		Thomson, John (1805-1841) .	740
		Thomson, John (1705-1848) .	740
		Thomson, John Cookburn (1884-1880). See under Thomson, Henry William (Byerley).
		Thomson, Joseph (1858-1804) .	742
		Thomson, Katharine (1797-1802) .	745

	PAGE		PAGE
Thomson, Richard ( d. 1618) . . . . .	746	Thorp or Thorp, Sir Robert de ( d. 1872) . . . . .	801
Thomson, Richard (1794-1865) . . . . .	747	Thorps, Thomas ( d. 1461) . . . . .	802
Thomson, Robert Dundas (1810-1864) . . . . .	748	Thorp, Thomas (1570?-1685?) . . . . .	803
Thomson, Robert William (1822-1878) . . . . .	748	Thorps or Thorp, Sir William de ( f. 1850) . . . . .	804
Thomson, Thomas (1708-1832) . . . . .	749	Thorp, William ( d. 1407?) . . . . .	806
Thomson, Thomas (1778-1852) . . . . .	751	Thrale, Mrs. (1741-1821). See Piozzi, Hester
Thomson, Thomas (1817-1878) . . . . .	752	Lynch.
Thomson, Thomas Napier (1798-1869) . . . . .	753	Thrseld, Caleb (1378-1728) . . . . .	805
Thomson, William (1748-1817) . . . . .	754	Thring, Edward (1821-1887) . . . . .	805
Thomson, William (1802-1832) . . . . .	755	Throckmorton, Francis (1564-1584) . . . . .	807
Thomson, William (1819-1890) . . . . .	756	Throckmorton, Job (1545-1801) . . . . .	809
Thornburn, Grant (1778-1863) . . . . .	759	Throckmorton or Throgmorton, Sir John
Thornburn, Robert (1818-1885) . . . . .	760	( d. 1445) . . . . .	810
Thoresby, John ( d. 1878) . . . . .	760	Throckmorton, Sir Nicholas (1515-1571) . . . . .	810
Thoresby, Ralph (1658-1735) . . . . .	763	Throgmorton. See Throckmorton.
Thorie or Thorius, John ( f. 1590-1611) . . . . .	764	Throsby, John (1740-1808) . . . . .	814
Thorne, Raphael, M.D. ( d. 1925) . . . . .	764	Thrupp, Dorothea Ann (1779-1847). See
Thorkill. See Thurkill.		under Thrupp, Frederick.
Thorn, Sir Nathaniel ( d. 1857) . . . . .	765	Thrupp, Frederick (1812-1895) . . . . .	815
Thorn, William ( f. 1897). See Thorne.		Thrupp, John (1817-1870) . . . . .	816
Thorn, Sir William (1781-1848) . . . . .	765	Thrupp, Joseph Francis (1827-1897) . . . . .	817
Thornborough, John (1551-1641) . . . . .	766	Thrucey, d. 975) . . . . .	817
Thornbrough, Sir Edward (1764-1884) . . . . .	767	Thurkibbi, Roger de ( d. 1260) . . . . .	817
Thornbury, George Walter (1828-1876) . . . . .	769	Thurkill, Thorkill, or Targessins ( d. 845) . . . . .	819
Thorndike, Herbert (1598-1872) . . . . .	770	Thunkill or Thorkill, the Earl ( f. 1009) . . . . .	820
Thorne, James (1795-1872) . . . . .	772	Thurland, Sir Edward (1606-1683) . . . . .	820
Thorne, James (1815-1881) . . . . .	778	Thurles, John (1618-1668) . . . . .	821
Thorne, John ( d. 1578) . . . . .	778	Thurlow, Edward, first Baron Thurlow. (1781-
Thorne, Robert ( d. 1537) . . . . .	774	1800) . . . . .	824
Thorne, William ( f. 1897) . . . . .	775	Thurlow, afterwards Hovell-Thurlow, Edward,
Thorne, William (1588?-1680) . . . . .	775	second Baron Thurlow (1781-1829) . . . . .	829
Thornhill, Sir James (1675-1784) . . . . .	775	Thurlof, Thomas (1737-1791) . . . . .	830
Thornhill, William ( f. 1728-1753) . . . . .	777	Thurmond, Mrs. ( f. 1715-1787) . . . . .	880
Thornton, Bonnell (1724-1768) . . . . .	777	Thurnam, John (1810-1878) . . . . .	831
Thornton, Sir Edward (1700-1852) . . . . .	779	Thursby, John de ( d. 1878). See Thoresby.
Thornton, Edward (1790-1875). See under		Thurstan or Turstin ( d. 1140) . . . . .	832
Thornton, Edward Parry.		Thurston, John (1774-1828) . . . . .	837
Thornton, Edward Parry (1811-1898) . . . . .	779	Thurston, Sir John Bates (1886-1897) . . . . .	837
Thornton, Gilbert de ( d. 1295) . . . . .	780	Thurtell, John (1794-1824) . . . . .	838
Thornton, Henry (1700-1815) . . . . .	781	Thurway, Simon ( f. 1184-1200). See Tour-
Thornton, John (1720-1780). See under		nay, Simon de.
Thornton, Henry.		Thwaites, Edward (1667-1711) . . . . .	840
Thornton, John (1788-1861). See under		Thwaites, George Henry Kendrick (1811-1883) . . . . .	841
Thornton, Samuel.		Thwayt, William of ( d. 1154). See Fitz-
Thornton, Robert ( f. 1440) . . . . .	788	herbert, William.
Thornton, Robert John (1768?-1887) . . . . .	784	Thweng, Marmaduke, first Baron ( d. 1828).
Thornton, Samuel (1755-1888) . . . . .	786	See under Thweng, Thwing, or Tweng,
Thornton, Thomas ( d. 1814) . . . . .	787	Robert de.
Thornton, Thomas (1757-1828) . . . . .	787	Thweng, Thwing, or Tweng, Robert de (1205?-
Thornton, Thomas (1786-1866) . . . . .	788	1268?) . . . . .	842
Thornton, Sir William (1779?-1840) . . . . .	789	Thyer, Robert (1709-1781) . . . . .	843
Thornton, William Thomas (1818-1880) . . . . .	790	Thynne, Francis (1545?-1806) . . . . .	848
Thornycroft, Mary (1814-1895) . . . . .	791	Thynne, Sir John ( d. 1580) . . . . .	845
Thornycroft, Thomas (1815-1885) . . . . .	792	Thynns, John Alexander, fourth Marquis of
Thorold, Anthony Wilson (1825-1895) . . . . .	792	Bath (1831-1890) . . . . .	846
Thorold, Thomas (1800-1864). See Carwell.		Thynne, Thomas, of Longleat (1048-1682) . . . . .	847
Thoroton, Robert (1623-1678) . . . . .	798	Thynne, Sir Thomas, first Viscount Wey-
Thoroton, Thomas (1723-1784) . . . . .	798	mouth (1640-1714) . . . . .	848
Thorp, Charles (1788-1803) . . . . .	794	Thynne, Thomas, third Viscount Weymouth
Thorp, Robert (1786-1812). See under Thorp,		and first Marquis of Bath (1784-1796) . . . . .	849
Charles.		Thynne, William ( d. 1546) . . . . .	850
Thorp, Benjamin (1792-1870) . . . . .	795	Tibetot. See Tiptoft.
Thorps, Francis (1595-1665) . . . . .	790	Tichborne, Chidiock (1558?-1586) . . . . .	854
Thorp or Thorp, John de, Baron Thorpe		Tichborne, Sir Henry (1581?-1667) . . . . .	855
( d. 1824) . . . . .	798	Tichborne, Sir Henry, Baron Ferrard (1668-
Thorps, John ( f. 1570-1610) . . . . .	798	1781). See under Tichborne, Sir Henry.
Thorp, John (1682-1750) . . . . .	800	Tichborne, Robert ( d. 1692) . . . . .	857
Thorp, John (1715-1793) . . . . .	801	Tickell, Mrs. Mary (1756?-1787). See Linley,
Thorp, Robert de ( f. 1200) . . . . .	801	Mary.
Thorp or Thorp, Robert de (1294?-1880).		Tickell, Richard (1751-1793) . . . . .	858
See under Thorpe or Thorp, John de, Baron		Tickell, Thomas (1686-1740) . . . . .	860
Thorp.		Tidcomb or Tidcombe, John (1642-1718) . . . . .	863

Tidd, William (1760-1847)			Todd, Elliott d'Arcy (1808-1845)	PA02
Tidey, Alfred (1808-1892)	883		Todd, Henry John (1768-1845)	906
Tidey, Henry (1814-1872)	883		Todd, Hugh (1858?-1728)	908
Tidferth or Tidfrith ( d. 828?)	888		Todd, James Hamthorn (1805-1860)	910
Tidy, Charles Meymott (1848-1862)			Todd, Robert Bentley (1800-1830)	912
Tiernan or Tighearnan, O'Rourke ( d. 1172).			Todhunter, Isaac (1826-1884)	914
See O'Rourke.			Toft or Tofts, Mary (1761?-1768)	915
Tierney, George (1761-1880)	885		Tofts, Robert ( d. 1620)	916
Tierney, Mark Aloysius (1765-1862)	886		Tofts, Katherine, afterwards Smith (1680?-1758?)	917
Tierney, Sir Matthew John (1776-1845)	887		Tofts, Mary (1761?-1768). See Toft.
Tiffin, William (1805?-1759)	888		Toland, John (1670-1722)	918
Tighe, Mrs. Mary (1772-1810)	898		Toler, John, first Earl of Norbury (1745-1881)	922
Tighearnach ( d. 1688). See O'Brain.			Tolfray, William (1778?-1817)	924
Tilbury, Gervase of ( f. 1211). See Gervase.			Tollemache, Talmash, or Talmash, Thomas (1651?-1694)	924
Tillemane, Peter (1684-1784)	889		Toller, Sir Samuel ( d. 1821)	927
Tillesley, Richard (1582-1621)	889		Tollet, Elizabeth (1694-1754)	928
Tilley, Sir Samuel Leonard (1818-1890)	870		Tollet, George (1725-1770). See under Tollet, Elizabeth.
Tillinghast, John (1804-1855)	871		Tom or Thom, John Nichols (1706-1868)	929
Tilloch, Alexander (1769-1825)	871		Tombes, John (1008?-1076)	929
Tillotson, John (1686-1664)	872		Tombes, Sir Henry (1821-1874)	931
Tilly, William, of Selling ( d. 1464). See Selling, William.			Tomes, Sir John (1815-1895)	933
Tilney, Charles (1561-1586). See under Tilney, Edmund.			Tomkins, Charles ( f. 1770). See under Tomkins, Peltro William.
Tilney, Edmund ( d. 1610)	879		Tomkins, Giles ( d. 1608?). See under Tomkins, Thomas ( d. 1630).
Tilney, John ( f. 1480)	87		Tomkins, John (1580-1688). See under Tomkins, Thomas ( d. 1630).
Tilley, John (1614-1684)	880		Tomkins, John (1668?-1706)	934
Tilson, Henry (1659-1695)	880		Tomkins, Martin ( d. 1755?)	935
Tilt, John Edward (1815-1898)	881		Tomkins, Nathanael ( d. 1681). See under Tomkins, Thomas ( d. 1630).
Timberlake, Henry ( d. 1628)	881		Tomkins, Peltro William (1759-1810)	936
Timberlake, Henry ( f. 1765). See under Timberlake, Henry ( d. 1628).			Tomkins, Thomas ( f. 1614). See Tomkins, Thomas ( d. 1630).
Timbrell, Henry (1806-1849)	882		Tomkins, Thomas (1637-1675)	938
Timbrell, James O. (1810-1850). See under Timbrell, Henry.			Tomkins, Thomas (1748-1810)	939
Timbs, John (1801-1875)	882		Tomkins, William (1780?-1792). See under Tomkins, Peltro William.
Timperley, Charles H. (1704-1840?)	888		Tomkinson, Thomas (1681-1716?)	940
Tindal, Matthew (1657-1738)	888		Tomkis or Tomkys, Thomas ( f. 1614)	940
Tindal, Nicholas (1687-1774)	885		Tomlins, Sir George Pretyma (1750-1827)	941
Tindal, Sir Nicholas Conyngham (1776-1846)	880		Tomlins, Elizabeth Sophia (1769-1828). See under Tomlins, Sir Thomas Edlyne.
Tindal, William ( d. 1586). See Tyndale.			Tomlins, Frederick Guost (1804-1807)	944
Tindal, William (1750-1804)	887		Tomlins, Sir Thomas Edlyne (1762-1841)	944
Tinmouth, John de ( f. 1806)	888		Tomlins, Thomas Edlyne (1801-1872). See under Tomlins, Sir Thomas Edlyne.
Timney, John ( d. 1761)	888		Tomlinson, Charles (1808-1897)	945
Tipper, John ( d. 1718)	888		Tomlinson, Matthew (1617-1681). See Tomlinson.
Tipping, William (1598-1640)	888		Tomlinson, Nicholas (1765-1847)	946
Tiptoft or Tibetot, John Baron Tiptoft (1375?-1448)	880		Tomlinson, Richard (1827-1871). See Montgomery, Walter.
Tiptoft or Tibetot, John, Earl of Worcester (1427?-1470)	891		Tonos, Glyn Colhi (1706-1838). See Evans, Thomas.
Tiptoft, Robert de, Baron Tibetot or Tiptoft ( d. 1298)	894		Tompion, Thomas (1660-1718)	947
Tirechan ( f. 7th cent.)	894		Tompson, Richard ( d. 1668?)	948
Tisel or Tyrrell, Walter ( f. 1160)	894		Toms, Peter ( d. 1777)	949
Tirwhit, Robert ( d. 1428). See Tyrwhitt.			Tomson, Laurence (1680-1668)	949
Tisdal, Philip (1708-1777)	895		Tomson, Richard ( f. 1688)	949
Tisdal or Tisdall, William (1660-1785)	893		Tone, Theobald Wolfe (1708-1798)	950
Tisdale, Tyssall, or Tyssdale, John ( f. 1556-1568)	890		Tone, William Theobald Wolfe (1761-1828). See under Tone, Theobald Wolfe.
Titcomb, Jonathan Holt (1810-1887)	897		Tong, William (1662-1727)	950
Tite, Sir William (1708-1878)	898		Tonge or Tongue, Israel or Ezerel [Ezrael] (1621-1680)	957
Titiens (correctly Tietjens), Teresa Caroline Johanna (1881-1877)	899		Tonkin, Thomas (1678-1742)	950
Titley, Walter (1760-1768)	890		Tonna, Charlotte Elizabeth (1706-1846)	961
Titus, Silius (1628?-1764)	900		Tonna, Lewis Hippolytus Joseph (1812-1837)	962
Tobias ( d. 796)	902
Tobin, George (1708-1888)	902
Tobin, John (1770-1804)	902
Todive, Richard ( d. 1108). See Richard of Ichester.
Tod, James (1782-1885)	904
Todd, Alpheus (1821-1884)	905

	PAGE		PAGE
Tonneys, Toney, or Toney, John ( d. 1510?) . . . . .	962	Tours, Berthold (1888-1897) . . . . .	1010
Tonson, Jacob (1656?-1788) . . . . .	962	Tours, Stephen de ( d. 1198). See under Turnham, Stephen de . . . . .
Tonson, Jacob ( d. 1787). See under Tonson, Jacob (1656?-1788) . . . . .		Tovey, De Blossiers (1692-1746) . . . . .	1016
Tonson, Richard ( d. 1772). See under Ton- son, Jacob (1656?-1788) . . . . .		Tovey-Tennent, Hamilton (1782-1866) . . . . .	1017
Tonstall, Cuthbert (1474-1539). See Tunstall. Tooke. See also Tuke . . . . .		Towers, John ( d. 1049) . . . . .	1017
Tooke, Andrew (1678-1782) . . . . .	966	Towers, John (1747?-1804). See under Towers, Joseph . . . . .
Tooke, George (1595-1875) . . . . .	966	Towers, Joseph (1787-1799) . . . . .	1018
Tooke, John Horne (1736-1812) . . . . .	967	Towers, Joseph Lomas (1787?-1881). See under Towers, Joseph . . . . .
Tooke, Thomas (1774-1858) . . . . .	974	Towers, William (1617?-1666). See under Towers, John ( d. 1649) . . . . .
Tooke, William (1744-1820) . . . . .	978	Towers, Gabriel ( d. 1628) . . . . .	1019
Tooke, William (1777-1868) . . . . .	977	Towers, Gabriel (1685?-1697) . . . . .	1020
Tooker or Tucker, William (1558?-1821) . . . . .	978	Towers, William (1555-1577) . . . . .	1020
Tootel, Hugh (1072-1748). See Dodd, Charles . . . . .		Towgood, Matthew ( f. 1710-1748). See under Towgood, Michaijah . . . . .
Topcliffe, Richard (1592-1604) . . . . .	979	Towgood, Michaijah (1700-1792) . . . . .	1021
Topham, Edward (1751-1820) . . . . .	980	Towgood, Richard (1595?-1688) . . . . .	1022
Topham, Francis William (1808-1877) . . . . .	982	Towne, Charles ( d. 1850?) . . . . .	1022
Topham, John (1746-1808) . . . . .	983	Towne, Francis (1740-1816) . . . . .	1023
Topham, Thomas (1710?-1749) . . . . .	983	Towne, John (1711?-1791) . . . . .	1023
Toplady, Augustus Montague (1740-1778) . . . . .	984	Towne, Joseph (1808-1879) . . . . .	1023
Topley, William (1841-1894) . . . . .	988	Towneley or Townlay, Charles (1787-1805) . . . . .	1024
Topsell, Edward ( d. 1639?) . . . . .	986	Towneley, Christopher (1604-1674) . . . . .	1025
Torkington, Sir Richard ( f. 1517) . . . . .	987	Towneley, Francis (1709-1740) . . . . .	1026
Torpichen, Lords. See Sandilands, James, first Lord, d. 1570; Sandilands, James, seventh Lord, d. 1753 . . . . .		Towneley, John (1697-1782) . . . . .	1027
Torporley, Nathaniel (1564-1632) . . . . .	988	Townlay, Sir Charles (1718-1774) . . . . .	1028
Torr, William (1808-1874) . . . . .	988	Townley, James (1714-1778) . . . . .	1028
Torre, James (1649-1699) . . . . .	989	Townley, James (1774-1838) . . . . .	1029
Torrrens, Sir Arthur Wellesley (1809-1855) . . . . .	990	Townsend. See also Townshend . . . . .
Torrrens, Sir Henry (1779-1828) . . . . .	991	Townsend, Aurelian ( f. 1601-1643) . . . . .	1030
Torrrens, Robert (1780-1864) . . . . .	998	Townsend, George (1788-1857) . . . . .	1031
Torrrens, Sir Robert Richard (1814-1884) . . . . .	995	Townsend, George Herbert ( d. 1869) . . . . .	1032
Torrrens, William Torrens McCullagh (1818- 1894) . . . . .	995	Townsend, Isaac ( d. 1765) . . . . .	1032
Torrignano, Pietro (1472-1522) . . . . .	998	Townsend, John (1757-1826) . . . . .	1033
Torrington, Earl of. See Herbert, Arthur (1647-1718) . . . . .		Townsend, Joseph (1789-1818) . . . . .	1033
Torrington, Viscount. See Byng, George (1668-1788) . . . . .		Townsend or Townesend, Richard (1618?- 1692) . . . . .	1034
Torshell or Torshel, Samuel (1604-1650) . . . . .	998	Townsend, Richard (1891-1884) . . . . .	1035
Tostig, Tosti, or Tostinus ( d. 1060) . . . . .	998	Townsend, William Charles (1808-1850) . . . . .	1035
Totington or Tottington, Samson de (1185- 1211). See Samson . . . . .		Townshend. See also Townsend . . . . .
Toynes, Earl of. See Carew, George (1555- 1829) . . . . .		Townshend, Charles, second Viscount Towns- hend (1674-1788) . . . . .	1036
Toto, Anthony ( f. 1518-1551) . . . . .	1001	Townshend, Charles, third Viscount Towns- hend (1700-1764). See under Townshend, Charles, second Viscount Townshend . . . . .
Tottel, Richard ( d. 1594) . . . . .	1001	Townshend, Charles (1725-1767) . . . . .	1044
Tottenham, Charles (1685-1758) . . . . .	1002	Townshend, Charles, first Baron Bayning (1728-1810) . . . . .	1047
Tonchet, George ( d. 1689?) . . . . .	1003	Townshend, Charles Fox (1705-1817) . . . . .	1047
Touchet, James, seventh Baron Audley (1405?-1497) . . . . .	1003	Townshend, Chauncy Hars (1798-1868) . . . . .	1048
Tonchet, James, Baron Audley of Hely or Heleigh, third Earl of Castlehaven (1617?- 1684) . . . . .	1004	Townshend, George (1715-1769) . . . . .	1048
Toulmin, Camilla Dufour, afterwards Mrs. Newton Crosland (1812-1895) . . . . .	1003	Townshend, George, fourth Viscount and first Marquis Townshend (1724-1807) . . . . .	1050
Toulman, Joshua, D.D. (1740-1815) . . . . .	1009	Townsend, George, second Marquis Towns- hend, Earl of Leicester, and Baron de Ferrars of Chartley (1756-1811) . . . . .	1058
Toulmin Smith, Joshua (1816-1890). See Smith . . . . .		Townshend, George Ferrars, third Marquis Townshend (1778-1855). See under Towns- hend, George, second Marquis Townshend, Earl of Leicester, and Baron de Ferrars of Chartley . . . . .
Townson. See Townson . . . . .		Townshend, Hayward ( f. 1803) . . . . .	1054
Toup, Jonathan (1718-1785) . . . . .	1010	Townshend, Sir Horatio, first Viscount Townshend (1680?-1687) . . . . .	1055
Touraine, Dukes of. See Douglas, Archibald, first Duke, 1869?-1424; Douglas, Archi- bald, second Duke, 1891?-1489; Douglas, William, third Duke, 1428?-1440 . . . . .		Townshend, Horatio (1750-1887) . . . . .	1056
Tournay, Simon of ( f. 1184-1200) . . . . .	1018	Townshend, Sir John (1664-1808). See under Townshend, Sir Roger (1543?- 1590) . . . . .
Tourneur, Turnour, or Turner, Cyril (1575?- 1620) . . . . .	1014	Townshend, John (1789-1846) . . . . .	1050

	PAGE		PAGE
Townshend, Sir Roger ( d. 1408) . . . . .	1058	Trelawny, Edward (1699-1754) . . . . .	1101
Townshend, Sir Roger (1548 ?-1590) . . . . .	1057	Trelawny, Edward John (1792-1891) . . . . .	1102
Townshend, Roger (1708-1760). See under		Trelawny, Sir John ( f. 1429) . . . . .	1105
Townshend, Charles, second Viscount		Trelawny, Sir Jonathan (1650-1721) . . . . .	1108
Townshend.		Trelawny, Sir William ( d. 1772). See under Townshend, Thomas (1701-1780). See under		Trelawny, Edward.
Townshend, Charles, second Viscount		Tremamondo, Domenico Angelo Malevolti
Townshend.		(1716-1802) . . . . .	1110
Townshend, Thomas, first Viscount Sydney		Tremamondo, Henry Angelo (1780-1899 ?). See under
(1738-1800) . . . . .	1058	Tremamondo, Domenico Angelo
Townshend, William (1702?-1788). See under		Malovolti.
Townshend, Charles, second Viscount		Tremayne, Edmund ( d. 1582) . . . . .	1111
Townshend.		Tremayne or Tremaine, Sir John ( d. 1894) . . . . .	1112
Townson, Townson, or Toulson, Robert		Tremayno, Richard ( d. 1584). See under (1575-1621) . . . . .	1000	Tremayne, Edmund.
Townson, Robert ( f. 1792-1709) . . . . .	1000	Tremellius, John Immanuel (1510-1580) . . . . .	1118
Townson, Thomas (1715-1792) . . . . .	1000	Tremenheere, Hugh Seymour (1804-1808) . . . . .	1114
Towry, George Henry (1707-1809) . . . . .	1001	Tremenheere, Walter (1701-1855). See under
Townson, John Thomas (1804-1881) . . . . .	1002	Tremenheere, Hugh Seymour.
Toy, Humphrey (1540 ?-1577) . . . . .	1008	Trench, Francis Chenevix (1805-1886) . . . . .	1115
Toy, John (1611-1888) . . . . .	1008	Trench, Frederick Chenevix (1887-1804). See
Toy, Robert ( d. 1550). See under Toy, Hum-		under Trench, Richard Chenevix.
phrey.		Trench, Sir Frederick William (1775-1850) . . . . .	1118
Toynbee, Arnold (1852-1888) . . . . .	1088	Trench, Melesina (1788-1827) . . . . .	1118
Toynbee, Joseph (1815-1868) . . . . .	1083	Trench, Power le Poor (1770-1889) . . . . .	1118
Tozer, Aaron (1788-1854) . . . . .	1000	Trench, Richard Chanovix (1807-1886) . . . . .	1118
Tozer, Henry (1602-1050) . . . . .	1007	Trench, Richard le Poor, second Earl of Clan-
Tracy, Richard ( d. 1569) . . . . .	1087	carthy of the second creation in the peerage
Tracy, Robert (1665-1785) . . . . .	1009	of Ireland, and first Viscount Clancarty of
Tracy, William de ( d. 1178) . . . . .	1069	the United Kingdom (1707-1887) . . . . .	1121
Tracy, William ( d. 1580). See under Tracy,		Trench, William Stewart (1808-1872) . . . . .	1128
Richard.		Trenchard, Sir John (1640-1695) . . . . .	1128
Tradescant, John ( d. 1687 ?) . . . . .	1070	Trenchard, John (1082-1728) . . . . .	1126
Tradescant, John (1608-1602) . . . . .	1072	Trengrouse, Henry (1772-1854) . . . . .	1120
Trabacern ap Caradog ( d. 1081) . . . . .	1074	Tresham, Francis (1507?-1805) . . . . .	1127
Traberne, John Montgomery (1788-1800) . . . . .	1075	Tresham, Henry (1749?-1814) . . . . .	1129
Trabherne, Bartholomew (1510 ?-1558 ?) . . . . .	1075	Tresham, Sir Thomas ( d. 1471) . . . . .	1180
Trail, Robert (1042-1718) . . . . .	1077	Tresham, Sir Thomas ( d. 1559) . . . . .	1181
Trail, Walter ( d. 1401) . . . . .	1078	Tresham, Sir Thomas (1548?-1605). See
Trail, Thomas Stewart (1781-1802) . . . . .	1078	under Tresham, Sir Thomas ( d. 1559).
Train, Joseph (1770-1852) . . . . .	1078	Tresham, William ( d. 1450) . . . . .	1182
Trant, 'Sir' Nicholas (1760-1889) . . . . .	1080	Tresham, William ( d. 1509) . . . . .	1188
Trapp, John (1801-1000) . . . . .	1082	Tresilian, Sir Robert ( d. 1888) . . . . .	1183
Trap, Joseph (1679-1747) . . . . .	1082	Trevelyan, Sir Charles Edward (1807-1886) . . . . .	1185
Traquair, first Earl of. See Stewart, Sir		Trevelyan, Raleigh (1781-1865) . . . . .	1186
John ( d. 1050).		Trevelyan, Sir Walter Calverley (1707-1879) . . . . .	1187
Travers, Benjamin (1738-1858) . . . . .	1085	Trevenon, James (1700-1790) . . . . .	1187
Travers, Sir Eaton Stannard (1732-1853) . . . . .	1080	Trevera, Peter ( f. 1525) . . . . .	1189
Travers, James (1820-1884) . . . . .	1087	Trevet, Sir Thomas ( d. 1288). See under
Travers, John ( d. 1620). See under Travers,		Trivet or Trevet, Nicholas.
Walter.		Trevisa, John de (1328-1412) . . . . .	1180
Travers, John (1708 ?-1758) . . . . .	1088	Trevithick, Richard (1771-1838) . . . . .	1140
Travers, Rebecca (1609-1888) . . . . .	1088	Trevor, Arthur Hill, third Viscount Dun-
Travers, Walter (1548 ?-1885) . . . . .	1080	gannon of the second creation in the
Travis, George (1741-1797) . . . . .	1081	peerage of Ireland (1708-1802) . . . . .	1144
Traby, Sir George (1044 ?-1700) . . . . .	1082	Trevor, George (1809-1888) . . . . .	1145
Tredenham, John (1688-1710) . . . . .	1093	Trevor or Trevaux, John ( d. 1410) . . . . .	1147
Tredgold, Thomas (1788-1820) . . . . .	1094	Treoor, Sir John (1620-1872) . . . . .	1148
Tredway, Lettice Mary (1598-1677) . . . . .	1005	Trevor, Sir John ( d. 1078). See under Trevor,
Tree, Ann Maria (1801-1889). See Brad-		Sir John (1828-1072).
shaw.		Trevor, Sir John (1687-1717) . . . . .	1149
Tree, Ellen (1805-1880). See Kean, Mrs.		Trevor, John Hampden, third Viscount
Ellen.		Hampden (1740-1824) . . . . .	1180
Tregallas, Walter Hawken (1881-1804) . . . . .	1090	Trevor, Marcus, first Viscount Dungannon of
Tregelles, Edwin Octavius (1800-1886) . . . . .	1098	the first creation, and Baron Trevor of Rose
Tregelles, Samuel Eridaun (1813-1875) . . . . .	1097	Trevor in the peerage of Ireland (1613-
Tregian, Francis (1548-1008) . . . . .	1098	1670) . . . . .	1151
Tregonwell, Sir John ( d. 1805) . . . . .	1099	Trevor, Michael ( d. 1471). See Tregury.
Tregon, Baron (1559-1880). See St. John,		Trevor, Richard (1707-1771) . . . . .	1153
Oliver.		Trevor, Robert Hampden, first Viscount
Tregury or Trevor, Michael ( d. 1471) . . . . .	1100	Hampden and fourth Baron Trevor (1708-
Trelawny, Charles (1054-1781) . . . . .	1101	1788) . . . . .	1158

	PAGE		PAGE
Trevor, Sir Sackville ( f. 1632)	1154	Tryon, William (1735-1738)	1204
Trevor, Sir Thomas (1588-1656)	1155	Tuathal ( d. 544)	1204
Trevor, Thomas, Baron Trevor of Bromham (1658-1730)	1155	Tuchet. See Touchet.
Trichrug, Iago (1779-1844). See Hughes, James.		Tucker, Abraham (1705-1774)	1204
Trigge, Francis (1547?-1808)	1157	Tucker, Benjamin (1762-1839)	1206
Trimen, Henry (1843-1896)	1157	Tucker, Charlotte Maria (1831-1898)	1206
Trimleston, third Baron. See Barnewall, John (1470-1538).		Tucker, Henry St. George (1771-1851)	1207
Trimmer, Joshua (1793-1857)	1153	Tucker, Josiah (1712-1799)	1209
Trimmer, Mrs. Sarah (1741-1810)	1158	Tucker, Thomas Tudor (1775-1852)	1211
Trimnell, Charles (1630-1703). See under Trimnell, Charles (1688-1723).		Tucker, William (1558?-1821). See Tooker.
Trimnell, Charles (1688-1723)	1160	Tucker, William (1589?-1640?)	1212
Trips, John (1752?-1821). See Swete, John.		Tuckey, James Kingston (1776-1816)	1212
Tripp, Henry ( d. 1612)	1161	Tuckey, Anthony, D.D. (1599-1670)	1218
Trivet or Trevet, Nicholas (1253?-1828)	1161	Tudor, Edmund, Earl of Richmond, known as Edmund of Hadham (1430?-1456)	1215
Trivet, Sir Thomas ( d. 1888)	1163	Tudor, Jasper, Earl of Pembroke and Duke of Bedford, known as Jasper of Hatfield (1461?-1495)	1215
Trokelowe, Throklow, or Thorlow, John de ( f. 1880)	1164	Tudor, Margaret (1441-1509). See Beaufort, Margaret.
Trollope, Sir Andrew ( d. 1481)	1165	Tudor, Margaret (1489-1541). See Margaret.
Trollope, Anthony (1815-1882)	1165	Tudor, Owen ( d. 1481)	1217
Trollope, Arthur William (1788-1827)	1169	Tudway, Thomas ( d. 1728)	1218
Trollope, Edward (1817-1898)	1170	Tufnell, Henry (1805-1854)	1220
Trollope, Frances (1780-1868)	1170	Tufnell, Thomas Jolliffe (1819-1885)	1220
Trollope, George Barne ( d. 1850). See under Trollope, Sir Henry.		Tufton, Sackville, ninth Earl of Thanet (1767-1825)	1221
Trollope, Sir Henry (1756-1889)	1173	Tuke, Sir Brian ( d. 1645)	1222
Trollope, Theodosia (1825-1865)	1175	Tuke, Daniel Hack (1827-1895)	1223
Trollope, Thomas Adolphus (1810-1892)	1175	Tuke, Henry (1755-1814)	1224
Trollope, Thomas Anthony (1774-1895). See under Trollope, Frances.		Tuke, James Hack (1819-1896)	1224
Trollope, William (1798-1888). See under Trollope, Arthur William.		Tuke, Sir Samuel ( d. 1674)	1228
Trosse, George (1831-1713)	1177	Tuke, Samuel (1764-1857)	1228
Trotter, Catharine (1679-1749). See Cockburn.		Tuke, Thomas ( d. 1687)	1229
Trotter, Coutts (1837-1887)	1179	Tuke, William (1782-1823)	1230
Trotter, Henry Dundas (1803-1850)	1179	Tulk, Chaddas Augustus (1796-1849)	1230
Trotter, John (1757-1838). See under Trotter, Henry Dundas.		Tull, Jethro (1874-1741)	1231
Trotter, John Bernard (1775-1818)	1181	Tullibardine, Marquis of. See Murray, William ( d. 1748).
Trotter, Thomas (1780-1832)	1181	Tulloch, Sir Alexander Murray (1803-1864)	1236
Troubridge, Sir Edward Thomas ( d. 1853)	1182	Tulloch, John (1823-1898)	1234
Troubridge, Sir Thomas (1758?-1807)	1188	Tully or Tullie, George (1852?-1895). See under Tully, Thomas.
Troubridge, Sir Thomas St. Vincent Hope Cochrane (1816-1897)	1185	Tully, Thomas (1620-1678)	1237
Troughton, Edward (1738-1835)	1188	Tunstall or Tonstall, Cuthbert (1474-1559)	1237
Troughton, John (1687?-1881)	1187	Tunstall, James (1708-1769)	1242
Troughton, William (1814?-1677?)	1187	Tunstall, Marmaduke (1748-1790)	1246
Troy, John Thomas (1780-1823)	1188	Tunstall or Helmes, Thomas ( d. 1818)	1248
Trubbeville or Trubleville, Henry de ( d. 1339). See Turberville.		Tunsted, Simon ( d. 1869)	1244
Trübner, Nicholas (Nikolaus) (1817-1884)	1189	Topper, Martin Farquhar (1810-1889)	1245
Trubshaw, James (1777-1858)	1190	Turbe, William de ( d. 1175). See William.
Truman, Joseph (1831-1871)	1190	Turberville, Daubeney (1812-1898)	1247
Trumbull, Charles (1646-1724). See under Trumbull, Sir William.		Turbervills or Turbervill, Edward (1648?-1681)	1247
Trumbull, Sir William.		Turberville or Turbervilla, George (1540?-1610?)	1246
Trumbull, William ( d. 1835)	1191	Turbervills, Trubbeville, or Trubleville, Henry de ( d. 1289)	1250
Trumbull, Sir William (1639-1716)	1192	Turberville, Henry ( d. 1878)	1251
Truro, Baron. See Wilde, Thomas (1782-1855).		Turberville or Turbervyle, James ( d. 1570?)	1252
Trusler, John (1735-1820)	1195	Turbine, Ralph de ( d. 1122). See Ralph d'Esouras.
Trussell, John ( f. 1620-1842)	1193	Turford, Hugh ( d. 1718)	1252
Trussell, Thomas ( f. 1610-1625). See under Trussell, John.		Turgeon, Pierre Flavian (1787-1867)	1253
Trussell or Trussol, William, sometimes styled Baron Trussell ( f. 1830)	1197	Turgess or Turgesins ( d. 845). See Thunhill.
Trye, Charles Brandon (1757-1811)	1199	Turgot ( d. 1115)	1253
Tryon, Sir George (1832-1893)	1199	Turle, Henry Frederic (1865-1893)	1254
Tryon, Thomas (1884-1708)	1201	Turle, James (1802-1882)	1255
		Turmeau, John (1777-1846)	1256
		Turmeau, John Caspar (1809-1894). See under Turmeau, John.
		Tumbull, George (1662?-1668)	1256

	PAGE		PAGE
Turnbull, John ( d. 1800-1818) . . . . .	1256	Turton, John (1785-1808) . . . . .	1808
Turnbull, William ( d. 1454) . . . . .	1257	Turton, Thomas (1780-1864) . . . . .	1804
Turnbull, William (1729?-1790) . . . . .	1257	Turton, William (1762-1883) . . . . .	1804
Turnbull, William Barclay David Donald (1811-1868) . . . . .	1257	Tussaud, Marie, Madame Tussaud (1700-1850) . . . . .	1805
Turner, Mrs. Anne (1576-1615). See under Turner, George, M.D.		Tusser, Thomas (1524?-1580) . . . . .	1806
Turner, Charles (1774-1857) . . . . .	1258	Tutchin, John (1661?-1707) . . . . .	1809
Turner, Charles Tenyson (1808-1879) . . . . .	1259	Tutthill, Sir George Leman (1772-1835) . . . . .	1811
Turner, Cyril (1575?-1626). See Tournemur.		Tuttiatt, Lawrence (1825-1807) . . . . .	1811
Turner, Daniel (1687-1741) . . . . .	1259	Tweddell, John (1789-1799) . . . . .	1811
Turner, Daniel (1710-1798) . . . . .	1260	Tweddell, Ralph Hart (1843-1895) . . . . .	1812
Turner, Dawson (1775-1853) . . . . .	1261	Tweddell, Marquises of. See Hay, John, second Earl and first Marquis, 1720-1897; Hay, John, second Marquis, 1045-1718; Hay, John, fourth Marquis, d. 1702; Hay, George, eighth Marquis, 1787-1878; and Hay, Arthur, ninth Marquis, 1824-1878.
Turner, Dawson William (1815-1885). See under Turner, Dawson.		Tweddle, Alexander (1701-1884) . . . . .	1813
Turnor, Sir Edward (1617-1876). See Turnor.		Twoodie, William Menzies (1826-1878) . . . . .	1814
Turnor, Edward (1798-1887) . . . . .	1262	Twolla, Leonard, D.D. ( d. 1742) . . . . .	1814
Turnor, Francis, D.D. (1888?-1700) . . . . .	1263	Twong, Robert de (1203?-1268?). See Thwang.
Turnor, George, M.D. ( d. 1010) . . . . .	1264	Twine. See Twyne.
Turnor, Sir George James (1798-1807) . . . . .	1265	Twining, Elizabeth (1805-1889). See under Twining, Richard (1740-1824).
Turnor, James ( d. 1804). See Turner, Sir James.		Twining, Richard (1740-1824) . . . . .	1814
Turner, Sir James (1615-1686?) . . . . .	1265	Twining, Richard (1772-1857). See under Twining, Richard (1740-1824).
Turner, Joseph Mallord William (1775-1851) . . . . .	1268	Twining, Thomas (1785-1804) . . . . .	1816
Turner, Matthew ( d. 1788?) . . . . .	1277	Twining, Thomas (1776-1861). See under Twining, Richard (1740-1824).
Turner, Peter, M.D. (1542-1614) . . . . .	1278	Twining, Thomas (1800-1805). See under Twining, Richard (1740-1824).
Turner, Peter (1680-1653) . . . . .	1278	Twining, William (1790-1885) . . . . .	1816
Turner, Richard ( d. 1508?) . . . . .	1278	Twining, William (1819-1848). See under Twining, Richard (1740-1824).
Turner, Richard (1763-1788) . . . . .	1270	Twisden. See Twysden.
Turner, Richard (1724?-1791) . . . . .	1270	Twisleton, Edward Turner Boyd (1809-1874) . . . . .	1817
Turner, Robert ( d. 1590) . . . . .	1280	Twiss, Francis (1780-1827) . . . . .	1817
Turner, Robert ( d. 1651-1665) . . . . .	1281	Twiss, Horace (1787-1849) . . . . .	1818
Turner, Samuel ( d. 1647?) . . . . .	1281	Twiss, Richard (1747-1821) . . . . .	1819
Turner, Samuel (1740?-1809) . . . . .	1281	Twiss, Sir Travers (1800-1897) . . . . .	1820
Turner, Samuel (1765-1810) . . . . .	1282	Twiss, William (1746-1827) . . . . .	1822
Turner, Sharon (1708-1847) . . . . .	1288	Twiss, William, D.D. (1578?-1648) . . . . .	1824
Turner, Sydney (1814-1870). See under Turner, Sharon.		Twin Shon Catti (1580-1620?). See Jones, Thomas.
Turner, Thomas (1591-1672) . . . . .	1284	Twynford, Josiah (1640-1729) . . . . .	1326
Turner, Thomas (1645-1714) . . . . .	1285	Twynford, Sir Nicholas ( d. 1800) . . . . .	1227
Turner, Thomas (1749-1809) . . . . .	1286	Twyn, Brian (1579?-1644) . . . . .	1228
Turner, Thomas (1793-1878) . . . . .	1287	Twyn, John (1501?-1581) . . . . .	1229
Turner, Thomas Hudson (1815-1853) . . . . .	1288	Twyn, Lawrence ( d. 1576) . . . . .	1230
Turner, Sir Tomkyns Hilgrove (1706?-1848) . . . . .	1288	Twyn, Thomas, M.D. (1648-1618) . . . . .	1230
Turner, William ( d. 1504) . . . . .	1290	Twysden, John, M.D. (1007-1088) . . . . .	1231
Turner, William (1638-1701) . . . . .	1292	Twysden, Sir Roger (1507-1872) . . . . .	1231
Turner, William (1651-1740) . . . . .	1292	Twysden or Twisden, Sir Thomas (1602-1688) . . . . .	1237
Turner, William (1714-1704) . . . . .	1294	Tyo, Christopher (1497?-1572) . . . . .	1237
Turner, William, tertius (1788-1850). See under Turner, William (1714-1794).		Tyerman, Daniel (1778-1828) . . . . .	1240
Turner, William, secundus (1701-1859). See under Turner, William (1714-1794).		Tyers, Jonathan ( d. 1707) . . . . .	1241
Turner, William (1780-1803) . . . . .	1295	Tyers, Thomas (1720-1787) . . . . .	1241
Turner, William (1792-1807) . . . . .	1295	Tylden, Sir John Maxwell (1787-1806) . . . . .	1242
Turnerelli, Edward Tracy (1818-1806). See under Turnerelli, Peter.		Tylden, Richard (1819-1855). See under Tylden, William Burton.
Turnerelli, Peter (1774-1839) . . . . .	1296	Tylden, Thomas (1624-1688). See Godden, Thomas.
Turnham, Robert de ( d. 1211) . . . . .	1297	Tylden, William Burton (1790-1854) . . . . .	1242
Turnham, Stephen de ( d. 1215) . . . . .	1297	Tyldesley, Sir Thomas (1598-1651) . . . . .	1244
Turnor, Sir Christopher (1007-1075) . . . . .	1298	Tyler, Sir Charles (1700-1885) . . . . .	1245
Turnor, Edmund (1755?-1820) . . . . .	1299	Tyler, Sir George (1792-1802). See under Tyler, Sir Charles.
Turnor, Sir Edward (1617-1670) . . . . .	1300	Tyler, James Endell (1780-1851) . . . . .	1246
Turnor, Sir Edward (1643-1721). See under Turner, Sir Edward (1617-1878).		Tyler, Teghelor, or Heller, Walter or Wat ( d. 1381) . . . . .	1247
Turnour, Cyril (1575?-1620). See Tournour.
Turnour, George (1709-1848) . . . . .	1301
Turold ( d. 1075-1100) . . . . .	1301
Turpin, Richard (1708-1789) . . . . .	1302
Turquet de Mayenne, Sir Theodore (1578-1658). See Mayenne.
Turetin ( d. 1140). See Thurstan.
Turswell, Thomas (1548-1583) . . . . .	1308

Index to Volume XIX.

1399

	PAGE		PAGE
Tyler, William ( d. 1801) . . . . .	1848	Tyrrell, Sir John ( d. 1487) . . . . .	1869
Tylor, Alfred (1824-1884) . . . . .	1849	Tyrrell, Sir Thomas (1594-1672) . . . . .	1870
Tymme, Thomas ( d. 1020) . . . . .	1849	Tyrrell, Walter ( d. 1100). See Tirl.
Tymms, Samuel (1808-1871) . . . . .	1850	Tyrwhitt, John (1601-1671). See Spencer.
Tyndale, William ( d. 1586) . . . . .	1851	Tyrwhitt, Richard St. John (1827-1895) . . . . .	1871
Tyndall, John (1820-1893) . . . . .	1858	Tyrwhitt or Tirwhit, Sir Robert ( d. 1428) . . . . .	1872
Tyrawley, Lords. See O'Hara, Sir Charles, first Lord, 1640?-1724; O'Hara, James, second Lord, 1690-1778.		Tyrwhitt, Robert (1785-1817) . . . . .	1872
Tyrconnel, Earl and titular Duke of. See Talbot, Richard (1680-1691).		Tyrwhitt, Thomas (1780-1786) . . . . .	1878
Tyrie, James (1548-1597) . . . . .	1868	Tysdale, John ( d. 1550-1568). See Tisdale.
Tyrone, Earls of. 'See O'Neill, Con Bacach, first Earl, 1484?-1559?; O'Neill, Hugh, 1540?-1616, and O'Neill, Shane, second Earls, 1580?-1567; Power, Richard, first Earl of the Power family, 1680-1690.		Tysilio ( d. 600) . . . . .	1875
Tyrrell, Anthony (1552-1610?) . . . . .	1364	Tyson, Edward, M.D. (1050-1708) . . . . .	1875
Tyrrell, Frederick (1798-1848) . . . . .	1366	Tyson, Michael (1740-1780) . . . . .	1876
Tyrrell or Tyrell, Sir James ( d. 1502) . . . . .	1867	Tyson, Richard (1680-1750) . . . . .	1877
Tyrrell, James (1642-1718) . . . . .	1868	Tyson, Richard (1730-1784) . . . . .	1877
		Tytler, Alexander Fraser, Lord Woodhouse- lee (1747-1818) . . . . .	1877
		Tytler, Henry William (1752-1808) . . . . .	1879
		Tytler, James (1747?-1805) . . . . .	1879
		Tytler, Patrick Fraser (1791-1849) . . . . .	1880
		Tytler, William (1711-1742) . . . . .	1882

END OF THE NINETEENTH VOLUME.